

Please cite the Published Version

Kinghorn, Shane (2020) The Echo Chamber: Theater in a "Post-Truth" World. In: After In-Yer-Face: Remnants of a Theatrical Revolution. Palgrave Macmillan, pp. 231-246. ISBN 978-3-030-39427-1

DOI: <https://doi.org/10.1007/978-3-030-39427-1>

Publisher: Palgrave Macmillan

Version: Accepted Version

Downloaded from: <https://e-space.mmu.ac.uk/625748/>

Usage rights: © In Copyright

Enquiries:

If you have questions about this document, contact openresearch@mmu.ac.uk. Please include the URL of the record in e-space. If you believe that your, or a third party's rights have been compromised through this document please see our Take Down policy (available from <https://www.mmu.ac.uk/library/using-the-library/policies-and-guidelines>)

Metadata of the chapter that will be visualized online

| | | |
|-------------------------------|---|------------------------------------|
| Chapter Title | The Echo Chamber: Theater in a “Post-Truth” World | |
| Copyright Year | 2020 | |
| Copyright Holder | The Author(s) | |
| Corresponding Author | Family Name | Kinghorn |
| | Particle | |
| | Given Name | Shane |
| | Suffix | |
| | Division | |
| | Organization/University | Manchester Metropolitan University |
| | Address | Manchester, UK |
| | Email | S.Kinghorn@mmu.ac.uk |
| Abstract | Kinghorn responds to retrospective analyses of In-Yer-Face theatre that emphasize the role of storytelling in the absence of the “grand narratives” which, by the mid-nineties, had been overthrown by the postmodern skepticism that defined the era. He considers key contemporary debates surrounding postmodernity, in order to examine the specific status of “truth” and “authenticity” within the surge of verbatim theater practice that followed the new writing renaissance in the United Kingdom. The analysis examines the ways verbatim dramaturgies locate and expand definitions of those contested terms, in an attempt to reposition them within the cautious framing of current “post-truth” theories. Q2 | |
| Keywords (separated by “ - ”) | Verbatim - Documentary - Authenticity - Post-truth - Postmodern | |

AUTHOR QUERIES

- Q2 Please confirm if “theatre” in the phrase “In-Yer-Face theatre” should be retained as is. Please check if the same can be changed to “theater” except in the title of the book authored by Sierz.

The Echo Chamber: Theater in a “Post-Truth” World

Shane Kinghorn

The “post-truth” era poses a threat to the relevance, if not survival, of a form of theater to which the concepts of “truth” and “authenticity” stubbornly adhere. The vexed status of “authenticity” within verbatim theater practice is frequently questioned in critical discourses responding to the decade of intense activity that followed its revival in the United Kingdom. Academic criticism frequently rebukes verbatim artists’ compositional strategies—especially the contrivance of narrative coherence—for somehow belying the documentary impulse, as if factual integrity must be compromised by overtly “creative” intervention.¹ In this chapter, the term “verbatim theatre” indicates that the material will emphasize the assemblage of “testimony,” by which I mean the stories told through the words of individuals—the “private narratives” that, according to Carol Martin, infer “great authority to moments of utterance”²—gathered by practitioners through interview processes prior to production.

S. Kinghorn (✉)
Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK
e-mail: S.Kinghorn@mmu.ac.uk

© The Author(s) 2020
W. C. Boles (ed.), After In-Yer-Face Theatre, https://doi.org/10.1007/978-3-030-39427-1_15

IN-YER-FACE: A RETROSPECTIVE ASSESSMENT

19

AU3 20 Sarah Kane and Mark Ravenhill, the leading playwrights among the “dis-
 21 affected group of dramatists’ clustered under a series of monikers, includ-
 22 ing ‘the Britpack’ and ‘the New Brutalists,’”³ both resisted their 23 categorization as “In-Yer-Face” writers. Kane’s statement that movements
 24 “define retrospectively and always on grounds of imitation [...] the writers
 25 themselves are not interested”⁴ reverberates in Ravenhill’s later reflection
 26 on the mid-nineties moment when his hit play Shopping and Fucking
 27 (1996) “marked him as a potential ‘pack leader.’”⁵ Similarly reluctant, at 28 the time, to “label,” or even acknowledge, this “phenomenon,” Ravenhill
 29 found “the diversity of [the writers’] voices ... more striking than the simi-30 larities”; although “a series of unique, strong voices all emerged at the 31 same time,” they should not be “linked as a movement or school.”⁶ In his
 32 conclusion to In-Yer-Face Theatre, Aleks Sierz’s retrospective assessment 33 of the nineties new wave (to which his own, paradigmatic epithet has 34 famously, and persistently, adhered) articulates a sense of purpose and 35 optimism that prompts interrogation of its reputation for “uncompromis-36 ing sensationalism”⁷:

37 It was also a powerful reminder that culture is a place of half-truths, contra-
 38 dictions and ambiguity. Those searching for absolute truths and simple
 39 answers didn’t find them in theatre [...] [T]here was also a sense of hope 40 that by facing such extremes we might all grow more able to bear the real
 41 world of which they were a lurid reflection.⁸

42 Extolling Ravenhill’s Shopping and Fucking (1996) as an “impeccable 43 social document”—one that “captured the public mood”—Michael 44 Billington recalls also his hunger for “remedies for the characters’ urban 45 angst.”⁹ That the plays of the nineties “lacked ... any vision of Utopia”
 46 was, he concedes, the fundamental idea: “In the drifting, desolate
 47 Nineties ... there were no ready-made Utopias and no grand narrative
 48 schemes. The best we could hope to do was construct our own private 49 dreams and tell each other stories.”¹⁰ Billington’s emphasis on storytelling
 50 anticipates the intrinsic “promise” of documentary practice¹¹ that is prob-
 51 lematized, argues John F. Deeney, in Ravenhill’s work.

52 Rather than propagate absolute faith in the veracity of lived experience,
 53 Ravenhill’s plays “question the reliability of narrative (and its manifesta-54 tions in memory and history).”¹² Shoot/Get Treasure/Repeat (2007)—“a complex contemplation on the relationship between a real world epic narrative of recent history, and how individual life stories operate within”—is, argues Deeney, framed “as a retort to the preponderance of contemporary verbatim or documentary theatres,”¹³ allowing for poetry, metaphor even, to supplant the journalistic pragmatism of the genre.

Steve Waters’ thesis, ten years on from the debut of Blasted (1995), separates Sarah Kane from “the enfants terribles of the mid-1990s.”¹⁴ Drawing parallels between artistic and actual “terror,” Waters argues that although “Kane did not live to see the events of 9/11 and the ensuing open-ended ‘war on terror,’” her plays “resisted ideology ... in response to political conflicts enacted in the name of fixed identities and categories.”¹⁵ While “the post-ideological dramatists of the 1990’s ... shook themselves loose from the constraint of ‘grand narratives,’” Kane’s formal innovation in Blasted anticipated “the politics that would occupy the ensuing vacuum—post-humanist, experiential, non-consensual.”¹⁶ Into this “vacuum,” then, came the preoccupations that would inform the revival of verbatim practice in the United Kingdom, an epoch ostensibly triggered by the events of 9/11.¹⁷

Lib Taylor, examining the parallels and distinctions between “In-Yer-Face” drama and the “fact-based” theater that followed on its heels, argues that the former “sought its politics through shock and disgust,” while the latter “addressed events and issues that belonged squarely in the realm of political discourse, but treated these things by engaging the audience ... emotionally in the detail of real stories.”¹⁸ Taylor’s central thesis—that the “strategies of immediacy and directness” found in the nineties new wave are cultivated, in verbatim theater, into strategies of “emotional enlistment”¹⁹—will be revisited later in this chapter, when Taylor’s emphasis on subjective attachment to political mindsets is reexamined in light of current cultural forces.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED TO TRUTH?

Verbatim theater experienced its resurgence in the United Kingdom at a time bereft of trust in political discourse, when theater was challenging the ways audiences took meaning from stories. Spectators sought not “simple answers” (and surely not Utopias), but a greater sense of certainty, of factual accuracy, or even truth, than could be found outside the auditorium. Live encounter with testimony offered temporary communities privileged access to a reflection of the real world that seemed impulsive, unmediated,

92 and authentic.²⁰ Viewed from a present-day perspective, the expectation 93 that theater predicated on its truth claims could offer a welcome corrective 94 to the realities it purports to reflect looks nostalgic at best.

95 Now that it has become hugely challenging to fish through the cease-
96 less stream of social media for unprocessed, unbiased information, can 97 audiences still expect to find, in live encounters with verbatim testimony,
98 portals to “an urgent ‘truth’”?²¹ The Brexit debacle in the United Kingdom
99 and the lurid theatrics of Donald Trump have weathered our trust in gov-
100 ernment and the business of politics to the verge of erosion. In an age
101 when elected representatives and influential commentators brazenly
102 rebrand blatant lies as “alternative facts,” the demand for genuine facts
103 should be more urgent than ever. But the defining casualty of this extraor-
104 dinary “post-truth” era has been the steady decline of faith in their author-
105 ity. What has happened to truth?

106 While the significant characteristic of postmodernism is recognized by 107 both supporters and critics as “a Socratic impulse to question truths,”²² in 108 an ever more socially and behaviorally fragmented world “the lines of 109 force and meaning are more dispersed, more conflictual, more partial than 110 [the] term ... conveys.”²³ Douglas Kellner draws attention, however, to a 111 transformation in the current age “comparable in scope to the shifts pro-
112 duced by the industrial revolution.”²⁴ Predicting “a postindustrial, info-113 tainment and biotech mode of global capitalism, organized around new 114 information, communications, and genetic technologies,”²⁵ Kellner posits 115 that our social and cultural situation is hard to comprehend “in a hyper-116 capitalist culture of spectacles, simulacra and disinformation.”²⁶ Thus, we 117 are pivoted between the postmodern and the modern, “in an interim
118 period between epochs,”²⁷ an ambiguous situation foundational to Daniel
119 Schulze’s conception of the search for authenticity as a riposte to fragmen-
120 tation and uncertainty.²⁸ In postmodern life, posits Schulze, the notion of 121 authenticity has been replaced by that of multiple and constructed
122 identities.

123 Within pluralist models of twenty-first-century verbatim theater (see, 124 e.g., Robin Soans’s Talking to Terrorists [2005]),²⁹ the assembled presence 125 of individual testimonies entwines a number of competing, subjective
126 “truths,” disguising any thread that might be identified as a “master” nar-
127 rative. While the exposure of unreported voices intends to challenge the 128 authority of the “official” narratives that have conspired, through various 129 operations of power, to exclude them, the potential for authorial or political bias in the construction of “narratives of opposition”³⁰ has called into question their potential for offering more “truthful” accounts.

Schulze’s characterization of authenticity can be applied to the realms of theater and performance in the sense that it can be constructed and commoditized in contemporary culture: it is “created, performed and developed, and once it is established it becomes a social (unquestioned) reality.”³¹ Carol Martin argues that the “provocative” element of documentary theater “is the way in which it strategically deploys the appearance of truth while inventing its own particular truth through elaborate aesthetic devices.”³² In Schulze’s discussion of reality, the “real” materializes as the original, unmediated object.³³ Benjamin’s distinction is useful in that it sets up a qualitative difference in “object” and “facsimile.” Applied to verbatim strategies, these terms can be understood as the source material and its adaptation into theatrical presentation.

Citing *My Name Is Rachel Corrie*³⁴ as her primary example, Martin investigates the various types of “evidence” presented by documentary theater (the presence of documents, film clips, and so on) that act as surrogates for absent subjects. Here, those “surrogates” may be seen as the “original, unmediated objects” that trigger, in the audience, a temporal awareness of mortality through the idea that absent subjects might be “ghosted” by performers. If audiences then “create their own version of an (imagined) authentic past,” it follows that reality must be “experienced as staged, a mere representation that has no depth.”³⁵ Viewed from the perspective of our current, “post-truth” era, Schulze’s troubling notion that reality has no more depth and substance than a projection screen demands scrutiny. Such an inquiry leads the discussion of postmodernity and authenticity into confrontation with the cultural forces influencing the present-day sense of dysphoria. It brings us to the defining questions of our age: how did the truth become an endangered species in the West? How did subjectivity come to trump factuality?

THE “ECHO CHAMBER”: THEATER IN A “POST-TRUTH” WORLD

Are we living in a post-truth world? The answer to that question requires looking at definitions of the term, its origins, and applications, and then asking how it applies to theater. In a post-truth era, documentary and verbatim’s contested relationship to truth becomes even more problematic.

166 Does the widespread erosion of trust in sources of information, seen in the 167 proliferation of phrases such as “fake news” and “alternative facts,”³⁶
168 extend to the realms of theater and performance? If so, verbatim theater is 169 obsolete, because it is driven by a quest to expose the truth; without even 170 a vague collective sense of belief in, let alone what we mean by “truth,” the 171 quest becomes futile. But if post-truth is more about contemporary infor-172 mation overload, an avalanche that is burying truth alive, then the task of 173 verbatim practice—to clear away the debris of cascading falsehoods—
174 becomes more urgent, more necessary than ever.

175 Is a stable definition of post-truth possible? Oxford Dictionaries selected 176 “post-truth” as its word of the year in 2016, defining it as shorthand for 177 “circumstances in which objective facts are less influential in shaping pub-178 lic opinion than appeals to emotion and personal belief.”³⁷ This is an 179 intriguing definition that does not quite substantiate the hazy concept of 180 a “post-truth era” but does offer a tentative rationale for the word that 181 appears to cast subjective—personal—feelings as being “untruthful.” The 182 definition could serve perfectly well if the word was “post-fact.” It is hard
183 to comprehend the death of truth; intrinsic to the discourses and belief 184 systems foundational to an operative society, it is “a cornerstone of our 185 democracy.”³⁸ Postmodern discourse invites scrutiny of the concept but 186 has never entirely rejected “truth.”

187 The technologies we rely on and their uncanny powers of silent obser-
188 vation draw us into a quest for the truth condemned to perpetual deferral.
189 Technology can—and does—construct versions of ourselves made entirely 190 of algorithms designed to detect what we like to look at and lead us to 191 similar content. Thus, as I access the Internet, filters target my virtual self,
192 leading me to information I believe I have found and selected auton-
193 omously. Through that monitored interaction with technology, my real and 194 virtual selves become somehow fused, the consequence being that I am 195 guided from any opinions that may substantially challenge my own.

196 This development implies a loss of autonomy that Kellner, in his con-
197 ception of a new technoculture as a postmodern phenomenon, did not 198 foresee; his prediction of “a more decentralized, individualist and varie-
199 gated culture”³⁹ enables the subject to “generate postmodern selves—
200 multiple, fragmented, constructed and provisional, subject to experiment
201 and change,” the result being “awareness of the variety of roles we play
202 and dimensions to our subjectivity.”⁴⁰ Kellner, writing in 2007, had not 203 anticipated the commodification of online activity that has undoubtedly played a substantial role in the movement toward post-truth and has profound political implications. As Matthew d’Ancona states: 204

205

We have entered a new phase of political and intellectual combat, in which democratic [values] and institutions are being shaken to their foundations by a wave of ugly populism. Rationality is threatened by emotion, diversity by nativism, liberty by a drift towards autocracy. [...] At the heart of this global trend is a crash in the value of truth, comparable to the collapse of a currency or a stock.⁴¹ 206
207
208
209
210
211

In light of this apparent deficit it becomes necessary to expose the ways truth is obscured, and ignored, and fabricated; and consider whether, and how, we can get anywhere near to glimpsing, or grasping it. 212
213
214

As we increasingly receive our news through our mobile phones, it follows that social media profoundly influences the way we see the world. Michiko Kakutani observes a landscape in which “people live in increasingly narrow content silos and correspondingly smaller walled gardens of thought.”⁴² D’Ancona states that between them the “big five” providers—Google, Microsoft, Apple, Facebook, and Amazon—“outstrip ... all the databanks, filing systems and libraries that have existed in human history”; information about all of our online transactions “has become the most valuable commodity in the world.”⁴³ Further, 215
216
217
218
219
220
221
222
223

This technology has also been the ... engine of Post-Truth. [...] [While] it was optimistically assumed ... [it] would ... smooth the path to sustainable cooperation and pluralism ... the new technology has done at least as much to foster online huddling and general retreat into echo chambers.⁴⁴ 224
225
226
227

The terms “fact” and “truth” are not interchangeable: truth is more subjective. This does not mean either that people do not believe in or that they would necessarily dismiss facts; the point is that they are not emotionally invested in them. Facts may have lost their currency because areas of life that are not really about facts, but values, are no longer considered to be the monopoly of politicians, intellectuals, and self-appointed authorities. Indeed, one of the casualties of the post-truth era has been the discrediting of so-called experts, a situation that confinement to the echo chamber can only perpetuate and amplify. Facts, informed debate, even science “is under attack, and so is expertise of every sort.”⁴⁵ In this climate, the term “post-truth” is misleading: the issue becomes a matter of 228
229
230
231
232
233
234
235
236
237
238

239 who is qualified, or entrusted, to speak the truth. The danger comes when 240 people decide to trust a narrative that cannot be—or, worse, does not 241 ostensibly need to be—supported or verified by facts. Reinelt, stating that 242 audiences seek reassurance in “the assertion of the materiality of events, of 243 the indisputable character of the facts,”⁴⁶ implies that verbatim theater
 244 establishes trust through blending subjective truths with factually sound
 245 archival evidence; d’Ancona sees, in recent political narratives, that facts
 246 have lost their sovereignty.

247 Both Kakutani⁴⁷ and d’Ancona⁴⁸ find the possibility that postmodernist 248 texts, by questioning the very notion of objective reality, augured the 249 “post-truth” phenomenon. While postmodernists did not entirely dis-250 lodge the consensus that truth was a sacrosanct value, we have arrived at 251 the moment when “that consensus has collapsed.”⁴⁹ The US president’s 252 unlikely ascent may be indicative of its demise: “His rise to the most pow-253 erful office in the world, unhindered by care for the truth, accelerated by 254 the awesome force of social media, was the ultimate post-modern 255 moment.”⁵⁰ This discussion alludes not only to Donald Trump but also to 256 another defining moment of the post-truth era: the United Kingdom’s
 257 vote to leave the European Union in 2016. In her analysis of the Brexit
 258 campaign, the journalist Katherine Viner⁵¹ highlights the most persuasive, 259 emotive claims made by the key strategists (Gove, Farage, and Ukip donor 260 Arron Banks) that were subsequently revealed to have had no factual basis.

261 In light of these troubling developments, can verbatim theater offer a
 262 meaningful intervention? Anderson and Wilkinson see the explicit advan-
 263 tage of empathetic engagement with testifiers. They argue for “[a] com-
 264 munity’s need ... to be informed, engaged and transformed”⁵² in ways
 265 that invite them to respond to performances both intellectually and emo-
 266 tionally, a process further emphasized by Lib Taylor’s notion of “emo-
 267 tional enlistment.”⁵³ Their analyses posit that verbatim practice offers a 268 corrective forum for marginalized expressions of dissent: the authentic 269 storytelling of those individuals whose stories have been somehow con-270 signed to the margins, forgotten by history, or silenced by regimes of 271 power. In a skeptical (postmodern?) age, the audiences are, according to 272 Anderson and Wilkinson, attuned to the duplicitous nature of political 273 spin, so that they are “asked to examine what playwrights and performers
 274 consider as inauthentic.”⁵⁴ But an uneasy affiliation can be detected, here,
 275 between falsehoods in political ideologies (the “inauthentic” narratives)
 276 and the stories gathered from the testimony of real people that are some-
 277 how deemed worthier of trust (the “authentic” narratives).

If we are indeed living in a “sceptical” age—or even in a post-truth age—there is no compelling reason to believe that we should be more inclined to accept each other’s words than those of our elected representatives. Such an assumption homogenizes testimony, not just to a flatly oppositional narrative, but as somehow untethered to any form of external political influence, because it implies that the recounting of subjective experience is entirely free, in its articulation, from the biased expression of political affiliations. D’Ancona and Kakutani argue, however, that we are now being led to online content that closes off anything that may cast doubt upon, or oppose, content to which we have already expressed an affiliation. This is a form of “enlistment” that denies the agency advocated (below) by Lib Taylor.

In response to technological developments, our definition of “community” has changed: communities exist online, can be built through campaigning action, shared enthusiasms, obsessions, or political allegiances. The work of pioneering United Kingdom verbatim practitioner Alecky Blythe exhibits her fascination with journeys from division to cohesion in particular communities (see, e.g., London Road [2011],⁵⁵ Little Revolution [2014]).⁵⁶ While it is fastidiously observed and recorded, it is precisely that affinity to localized issues that gives the work its pervasively parochial accent, but also its optimism. The current “global community” now that it has shifted to an online collective owned and monitored by the “big five” expresses a conception of connectivity—the “echo chamber”—that taints the positive idea of unity. The question, now, must be whether the stories heard in verbatim theater—if they do encourage empathetic connection—also encourage an emotional affinity to subjective truth. D’Ancona sees this possibility, in the context of online “clusters,” as one of the contributory factors in the movement toward “enlistment” to narratives with no factual credibility. This development, seen in the context of recent political upheaval, is a threat to democracy. Is there any political agency in subjective reception?

Taylor does not explain precisely how the shift, in the spectator, from “a position of passive sympathy” to “active participation”⁵⁷ is actuated, but would seem to confirm Tomlin’s apprehension of pluralistic strategies in verbatim practice that ostensibly replace the single protagonist, consigning audiences to biased “narratives of opposition.”⁵⁸ D’Ancona has argued that, far from triggering oppositional activism, (online) emotional enlistment has a perilous tendency to silence opposition, and thus to play straight into the hands of the opponent. Taylor’s optimistic expectation is

317 that audiences will be directed to channel their “emotional enlistment”
 318 toward meaningful activism, demanding reform, if not revolution.
 319 Allowing for this possibility, the emphasis upon “authenticity” as securely
 320 residing in factual material loses some of its authority, but in a post-truth
 321 era, the erosion of any factual basis to the perception of authenticity is a
 322 troubling prospect. Can viable alternative strategies in verbatim practice 323 be evidenced?

324 INTO THE BREACH: IN SEARCH OF “AUTHENTICITY”

325 The truth claims made in, and of, verbatim theater have, according to 326 Amanda Stuart Fisher, been overemphasized because they place “limita-327 tions on theater’s capacity to respond authentically to real stories of 328 trauma.”⁵⁹ Stuart Fisher proposes “a more existentially nuanced articula-
 329 tion of truth grasped as ‘authenticity,’”⁶⁰ informed by Martin Heidegger’s 330 account of being-toward-death, which looks beyond pedestrian fidelity to 331 factual accuracy to consider “fidelity to the very conditions of our own
 332 existence.”⁶¹ The context of a post-truth era must acknowledge Stuart
 333 Fisher’s call for a shift of emphasis, in the assessment of verbatim practice,
 334 from its supposed obligation to generate “technical” and “factual” truth.

335 If the faithful replication of verbatim accounts can only touch the sur-
 336 face of traumatic experience, how else might such profoundly subjective
 337 depths be explored or “authentically examined”?⁶² An “authentic” meth-
 338 odology should break through the constraints imposed by factual legiti-
 339 macy and reach for different dramaturgical strategies capable of locating
 340 and inhabiting this liminal space. What does this “space” look and sound
 341 like? Arguably, we have already encountered it, in the tangential environ-
 342 ments imagined by the mid-nineties playwrights cited. Stuart Fisher looks 343 closely at the impact of trauma upon the subject: it can be perceived “as a
 344 ‘breach’ in the processes of cognition with which we ordinarily experience
 345 and make sense of the world.”⁶³ There are clear links to be found here, in 346 subject and form, with the experiential theater of Kane and Ravenhill: if 347 trauma cannot be assimilated into experience, it may therefore “stand radi-
 348 cally beyond language and communicability.”⁶⁴ The authors of “in-yer-349 face theatre,” in their articulation of “the experience of absence and 350 dislocation,”⁶⁵ captured the veracity of lived experience as defined by 351 Stuart Fisher; verbatim theater, in its phlegmatic reliance on the spoken 352 word, might actually foreclose communication of that which it seeks to 353 disseminate.

It should be acknowledged that Stuart Fisher is not concerned with forms of verbatim theater that necessitate the presentation of facts. The foremost example, in the United Kingdom, of “tribunal theatre,” *The Colour of Justice*⁶⁶ did not set out to investigate “what it means to speak of the truth”⁶⁷; rather, it intended—successfully, as it transpired—to evidence institutional racism within the Metropolitan Police. The hyperreal tribunal theater form offers no juncture at which a radical departure from mimetic modes of delivery might occur. There is a more convincing link to be found with Stuart Fisher’s call for a poetic dimension to the presentation of lived experience in Lloyd Newson’s dance-theater piece, DV8’s John (2014), the third in a sequence of verbatim pieces, following To Be Straight With You (2008) and Can We Talk About This? (2012).

Director Lloyd Newson’s intention in making John was to allow the company’s improvisational process—that is, the expression of their individual encounters with verbatim texts—to inform the somatic score. Thus, John offers a definition of authenticity that can be understood as “authentic” to their process, their experience, as much as to the traumatic experience of the testifiers. Arguably, the autobiographical content in DV8’s John, and the work’s extension, beyond spoken language, into physical expression of its extremities, force us more directly into contact with explicit experiences of trauma; into close proximity to mortality. Stuart Fisher is calling for verbatim strategies that somehow embrace and convey this dimension, and in doing so reveal a degree of “truthfulness” that factual accuracy (and mimetic performance styles) fails to disclose.

In DV8’s John, the titular protagonist’s narrative function oscillates between telling and reliving his own story, which is structured as a relentless chronology of trauma. The piece achieves a disorienting temporal trick through the juxtaposition of the “storied” John’s past tense, verbatim text, and its immediate, “here-and-now” enactment; the character is both interlocutor and participant, inhabiting a space located somewhere between detached reportage and embodied, integrated reconstruction of the past. Trauma, posits Stuart Fisher, “returns unbidden to disrupt the present while also radically re-aligning the subject’s vision of the future.”⁶⁸ DV8’s piece conveys this view: John is shown to have no control over the sequence of occurrences that make up his story, has limited control over their recollection and no control over their consequences.

While it has not proven possible to circumvent entirely the preoccupations with “truth” and “authenticity” that informs the critical landscape, I have drawn attention to one example of work that has pushed the form

393 from familiar treatments of verbatim material toward the formulation of 394 dramaturgies that expand the definitions of these terms. Finding innova-
 395 tive ways and means to engage with urgent, real-world issues and debates,
 396 Newson is a contemporary practitioner that still “authenticates” material
 397 through the veracity of verbatim testimonies, discovering that he need not 398 adhere to verbatim performance conventions in devising interpretative 399 strategies. The imitations of “authenticity” apparent in DV8’s work can be 400 seen in the utilization and exposure, within the formal properties of the 401 work, of their processes of making.

402 Newson’s work is not at all times crafted in service to the text: the pri-
 403 macy of the verbatim material is subverted by an elliptical, often cryptic
 404 somatic score, by images and impressions gathered from somewhere out-
 405 side and later imported. While those imported elements, being unrelated 406 to the spoken words, cannot always be read (in performance) with any 407 certainty of their precise meaning, what DV8 is doing with the text is 408 opening up a space for interpretation, making the audience work to con-409 nect action and image to their speech acts (or leaving them free to accept 410 this lack of correlation). Rarely seen in the treatment of verbatim material, 411 this is arguably one of the foremost tenets of the “in-yer-face” aesthetic.
 412 Such innovative treatment both suggests a way forward for the practice
 413 and brings us full circle to Ravenhill’s rebuttal of verbatim theater’s dog-
 414 matic adherence to factual accuracy, to the need for “a poetic and there-415 fore ... more political sensibility than ‘journalism’ allows.”⁶⁹

416

CONCLUSION

417 If indeed we are in a “post-truth” era, living in the era of “alternative 418 facts” and “fake news,” it is significant—perhaps inevitable—that the art
 419 being talked about now is dystopian fiction: it is worth noting that Orwell’s
 420 Nineteen Eighty-Four rose to the top of the bestseller charts days after 421 Americans were encouraged to embrace “alternative facts.” Fictional dys-
 422 topians can invite queasy recognition of our current circumstances; not 423 through facsimile, or Baudrillardian simulacra, but rather, through ele-
 424 ments of allegory: the celebrated television adaptation of Margaret 425 Atwood’s The Handmaid’s Tale, for example, exhibits recognizable paral-
 426 lels with the real world that seem to confirm our worst presentiments. I 427 had anticipated a second resurgence of verbatim theater in response to the 428 current political and cultural climate, but we are turning to work that 429 reflects a kind of foreboding, perhaps because we are resigned to a world in which the moderate, putatively liberal territory known as the “middle ground” has been squeezed out by the bellicose populism of recent political upheaval. The relationship of the genre to journalism has been undermined by the diminishing status, in the real world, of print journalism and the shift to online content. Fueled by rapid technological advances, and with astonishing rapidity, the persuasive influence of the “media,” as we knew it—the reportage and opinion of paid professionals—has been all but eclipsed by the ceaseless chatter of social media. This is not to pretend that print journalism is not possessed of a promiscuous relationship with truth, or that its readership is not divided along lines of politics, class, and income. Alongside the addictive distractions of Clickbait, there are positive aspects to this phenomenon: the secretive nexus of politicians and media moguls has been exposed and weakened; the voices of individuals in the public domain appear to have gained status and power. Yet the ownership and manipulation of social media by five supremely influential, global corporations raise serious doubts about where the power truly lies. The capacity of search engines to feed bogus news stories to our handheld devices has brought about unchecked assimilation of the fake and the real that Baudrillard could scarcely have conceived of.

The examples of verbatim theater cited consider the dissemination of marginal voices as a positive alternative, corrective or form of redress to the “master narratives” propagated by media corporations bound by their own political associations. Now, however, the proliferation of public opinion, expressive of more extreme, more reactionary, more polarized affiliation to online “clusters,” is the master narrative. The claim that verbatim theater could offer a viable alternative is no longer so easy to make: a form of theater predicated on the veracity of individual testimony seems destined, in the current climate, to get lost in the maelstrom. “In-yer-face theatre” is historically placed as a forerunner to the form, but its dystopian stories, offered in resistance to “the unrelenting ideological monopoly of late capitalism,”⁷⁰ might now be reconsidered as premonitions of the “post-truth” era. While my fascination with verbatim practice, and belief in its capacity for meaningful political intervention and aesthetic innovation, has not diminished, I conclude with the awareness that the status of “authenticity” and “truth” as sacrosanct values has diminished even further than postmodern skepticism would dare to have anticipated.

NOTES

- 467 1. See Stephen Bottoms, "Putting the Document into Documentary—An 468 Unwelcome Corrective?" The Drama Review 50, no. 3 (2006): 56–68;
 469 Jenny Hughes, "Theatre, Performance and the 'War on Terror': Ethical 470 and Political Questions arising from British Theatrical Responses to War
 471 and Terrorism," Contemporary Theatre Review 17:2 (2007): 149–164;
 472 Donna Soto-Morettini, "Trouble in the House: David Hare's Stuff
 473 Happens," Contemporary Theatre Review 15, no. 3 (2005): 309–319.
- 474 2. Carol Martin, "Bodies of Evidence," in Dramaturgy of the Real on the 475 World Stage, ed. C. Martin (Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2012), 23.
- 476 3. Graham Saunders, Love Me or Kill Me: Sarah Kane and the Theatre of 477 Extremes (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2002), 5.
- 478 4. Ibid., 7.
- 479 5. John F. Deeney, "Mark Ravenhill," in Fifty Modern and Contemporary 480 Dramatists, ed. John F. Deeney and Maggie Gale (London: Routledge, 481 2015), 190.
- 482 6. Mark Ravenhill, "A Tear in the Fabric," New Theatre Quarterly 20, no. 4 483 (2004): 310.
- 484 7. Peter Billingham, At the Sharp End (London: Bloomsbury, 2007), 134.
- 485 8. Aleks Sierz, In-Yer-face Theatre: British Drama Today (London: Faber, 486 2001), 24.
- 487 9. Michael Billington, State of the Nation (London: Faber, 2008), 361.
- 488 10. Ibid.
- 489 11. See Janelle Reinelt, "The Promise of Documentary," in Get Real:
 490 Documentary Theatre Past and Present, ed. Chris Megson and Allison
 491 Forsythe (Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan 2009), 1–25.
- 492 12. Deeney, 193.
- 493 13. Ibid., 194.
- 494 14. Steve Waters, "Sarah Kane: From Terror to Trauma," in A Companion to 495 Modern British and Irish Drama 1880–2005, ed. M. Luckhurst (London: 496 Wiley-Blackwell 2010), 377.
- 497 15. Ibid., 373.
- 498 16. Ibid., 381.
- 499 17. See Chris Megson, "This is all theatre: Iraq Centre Stage," Contemporary 500 Theatre Review 15, no. 3 (2005): 369–371; Carol Martin, "Bodies of 501 Evidence," in Dramaturgy of the Real on the World Stage, ed. Carol Martin
 502 (Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2012), 17–26; Liz Tomlin, 503 "Representing the real: verbatim practice in a sceptical age," in Acts and 504 Apparitions (Manchester, 2013), 114–142.

18. Lib Taylor, “The Experience of Immediacy: Emotion and Enlistment in Fact-based Theatre,” Studies in Theatre and Performance 31, no. 2 (2011): 226, my emphasis. 505
506
507
19. Ibid., 224. 508
20. See Paola Botham, “From Deconstruction to Reconstruction: A Habermasian Framework for Contemporary Political Theatre,” Contemporary Theatre Review, 18, no. 3 (2018): 307–317. 509
510
511
21. Taylor, 224. 512
22. Pelagia Goulimari, (ed.) Postmodernism. What Moment? (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2007), 1. 513
514
23. John McGowan, “They Might Have Been Giants,” in Postmodernism. What Moment?, ed. Pelagia Goulimari (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2007), 94. 515
516
517
24. Douglas Kellner, “Reappraising the Postmodern,” in Postmodernism. What Moment?, ed. Pelagia Goulimari (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2007), 104. 518
519
520
25. Ibid. 521
26. Ibid., 120. 522
27. Ibid., 119. 523
28. Daniel Schulze, Authenticity in Contemporary Theatre and Performance (London: Bloomsbury, 2017), 25. 524
525
29. Robin Soans, Talking to Terrorists (London: Oberon 2005). 526
30. See Liz Tomlin, “Representing the real: verbatim practice in a sceptical age,” in Acts and Apparitions (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2013), 114–142. 527
528
529
31. Schulze, 28. 530
32. Martin, “Bodies of Evidence,” 19. 531
33. Benjamin, Walter “The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction,” Marxist.org (1936), <https://www.marxists.org/reference/subject/philosophy/works/ge/benjamin.htm>. 532
533
534
34. Alan Rickman and Katharine Viner, My Name is Rachel Corrie (London: Nick Hern, 2005). 535
536
35. Schulze, 33. Author emphasis. 537
36. See Michiko Kakutani, The Death of Truth (London: William Collins, 2018), 13. 538
539
37. OED 2016: online. 540
38. Kakutani, 19. 541
39. Kellner, 106. 542
40. Ibid. 543
41. Matthew d’Ancona, Post Truth: The New War on Truth and How to Fight Back (London: Ebury Press, 2017), 8. 544
545
42. Kakutani, 117. 546

- 547 43. d’Ancona, 48.
548 44. Ibid., 49.
549 45. Kakutani, 23.
550 46. Janelle Reinelt, “Toward a Poetics of Theatre and Public Events,” in 551 Dramaturgy of the Real on the World Stage ed. Carol Martin (Basingstoke: 552 Palgrave Macmillan, 2012), 39.
553 47. Kakutani, 60.
554 48. d’Ancona, 92.
555 49. Ibid., 96.
556 50. Ibid., 97.
557 51. Katharine Viner, “How Technology Disrupted the Truth,” Guardian, July
558 12, 2016, https://www.theguardian.com/media/2016/jul/12/how-
559 technology-disrupted-the-truth (accessed October 10, 2017).
560 52. Michael Anderson and Linden Wilkinson, “A Resurgence of Verbatim 561 Theatre: Authenticity, Empathy and Transformation,” Australian Drama
562 Studies 50 (2017): 167.
563 53. Taylor, 223–237.
564 54. Anderson and Wilkinson, “A Resurgence,” 155. Author emphasis.
565 55. Alecky Blythe, London Road (London: Nick Hern, 2011).
566 56. Alecky Blythe, Little Revolution (London: Nick Hern, 2014).
567 57. Taylor, 229.
568 58. Tomlin, 120.
569 59. Amanda Stuart Fisher, “Trauma, Authenticity and the Limits of Verbatim,” 570 Performance Research 16:1 (2011), 112. Original emphasis.
571 60. Ibid.
572 61. Ibid.
573 62. Ibid., 114.
574 63. Ibid.
575 64. Ibid.
576 65. Deeney, 194.
577 66. Richard Norton-Taylor, The Colour of Justice: The Stephen Lawrence Inquiry
578 (London: Oberon, 1999).
579 67. Stuart Fisher, 113. Author emphasis.
580 68. Ibid., 116.
581 69. Deeney, 194.
582 70. Ibid., 190.

Author Queries

Chapter No.: 15 0004763686

| Queries | Details Required | Author's Response |
|---------|--|-------------------|
| AU1 | In the chapter title, "Theatre" has been changed to "Theater" as the chapter follows US spelling. Please confirm if that is okay. | |
| AU3 | In the sentence "Sarah Kane and Mark Ravenhill, ..." please provide opening single quote for the closing quote after "dramatists". | |

Uncorrected Proof