

The Guardian

Slumming it? Township tour reviews 'gloss over poverty'

Wealthy visitors to South African 'slums' are understating hardships faced by residents in reviews on Tripadvisor

Jamie Doward

Sun 16 Aug 2020 07:00 BST

Is it time to rethink “slum tourism”? Researchers at the University of Bath believe the answer is a resounding yes. They claim that foreign visitors are glossing over the hardships of those living in poor areas with well-meaning attempts to portray their inhabitants in a positive light.

The researchers analysed more than 400 Tripadvisor reviews for two townships outside Cape Town in South Africa regularly referred to as “slums”. They found that visitors to Langa and Imizamo Yethu underplayed the daily challenges facing people living there.

In recounting their experiences on Tripadvisor, the tourists regularly described the townships as productive, vibrant cultural spaces, rich in non-material assets, inhabited by happy and hard-working people.

Typical responses included: “We learned so much, and it was wonderful to be in the community, to experience the friendship, the solidarity - to see a new future being built”; “The level of poverty that these people live in is unbelievable. But everyone here has hope and aspirations of getting a house and work. Truly amazing people”; “There are hardworking people in the township who are making life better for themselves.”

However, the depictions often obscured the inequalities between poor residents and wealthy tourists.

Across 452 Tripadvisor reviews only four remarked on water, sanitation or sewerage. Only two observed that the vast majority of residents lived without toilets or running water inside their homes. Overall, the majority of reviews represented residents as satisfied with their circumstances, with several reviewers remarking that they thought the children in the townships had better lives than those from privileged backgrounds.

Writing in the journal Geoforum, the researchers suggest that this can lead to an unhealthy reframing of the debate about urban poverty.

“Over recent years, slum tourism has thrived across the world, fuelled by a growth in international travel, rapid urbanisation, and of course deepening levels of global inequality,” said lead researcher Dr Monique Huysamen, from the department of psychology at Bath. “It now forms part of an ever-growing ‘alternative’ tourism industry, which includes practices like ‘ecotourism’ as well as ‘voluntourism’ - a popular gap-year activity for young travellers from the global north.”

But she warned: “While township tours, if operated by local residents, may potentially offer certain economic benefits for these communities, we found that tourists’ reviews lead to a skewed representation of poverty and its causes, certainly in South African townships.

“Issues like inadequate sanitation - a topic which has been deeply politicised in recent years in South Africa - are too often glossed over, and the need for radical social and infrastructural change is invisible from their Tripadvisor reviews.”

The findings highlight how poverty tourism has become a double-edged sword for people living in slum areas.

“These ‘attractions’ are marketed as cultural experiences offering socially responsible alternatives to mainstream mass tourism,” Huysamen said. “They are marketed as an opportunity ‘do good while on holiday’. On the other hand, this kind of tourism has come under fire for supporting the commoditisation, romanticisation and consumption of poverty, and slum tourists are often accused of engaging in ‘poverty tourism’ or a form of ‘poverty porn’.”

But with much of international travel now on hold due to Covid-19, Huysamen said there was a chance to rethink and re-evaluate future tourism. “The pause in travel allows us an opportunity to think much more deeply about how such tourism might be reinforcing and exacerbating patterns of inequality and poverty. Where we do visit destinations where residents live in abject poverty, we need to think carefully about how we retell and represent these experiences to others, for example on social media, so that we are sure to paint a fuller picture of their lives and the challenges they face.”

Since you're here ...

... we have a small favour to ask. You've read 5 articles What's this? We would like to remind you how many Guardian articles you've enjoyed on this device. Can we continue showing you this? Yes, that's OK No, opt me out Please note you cannot undo this action or opt back in in the last year. And you're not alone; millions are flocking to the Guardian for open, quality news every day, and readers in 180 countries around the world now support us financially.

The crises we've faced in 2020 have underlined why factual information is indispensable to us all. We're determined to provide journalism that helps each of us better understand the world, and take actions that challenge, unite, and inspire change. With no shareholders or billionaire owner, our journalism is free from political and commercial bias - this makes us different. We can give a voice to the oppressed and neglected, and stand in solidarity with the struggle for truth, humanity and justice.

Supporting us means investing in Guardian journalism for tomorrow and the years ahead. The more readers funding our work, the more questions we can ask, the deeper we can dig, and the greater the impact we can have. Your support protects our editorial independence and autonomy, which allows us to fearlessly investigate and interrogate the words of those with political and commercial power - and help bring about a brighter, fairer future.

Your support means we can keep our journalism open, so millions more have free access to the high-quality, trustworthy news they deserve. So we seek your funding not simply to survive, but to grow our journalistic ambitions and inform more people. If there were ever a time to join us, and help accelerate our growth, it is now. You have the power to support us through these challenging financial times and enable real-world impact.

Every contribution, however big or small, is so valuable for our future. Support us today from as little as £1 - it only takes a minute. Thank you.

Support the Guardian

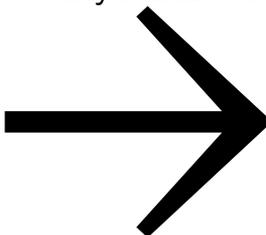

Remind me in October

Remind me in October
Email address

Set my reminder

We will use this to send you a single email in October 2020. To find out what personal data we collect and how we use it, please visit our Privacy Policy

We will be in touch to invite you to contribute. Look out for a message in your inbox in October 2020. If you have any questions about contributing, please contact us here.

Topics

- Poverty
- The Observer
- Tripadvisor
- South Africa
- Africa
- Social exclusion
- Travel websites
- news