

Horror Film and the Queer Spectator:
An Empirical Study of the Spectatorial
Relationships between Queerness,
Genre, and Drag Performance

H. O. PETROCELLI

PhD 2021

Horror Film and the Queer Spectator:
An Empirical Study of the Spectatorial
Relationships between Queerness,
Genre, and Drag Performance

HEATHER ORIANA PETROCELLI

A thesis submitted in partial fulfilment of the requirements of Manchester Metropolitan University for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy

Department of English
Manchester Metropolitan University

2021

Abstract

Queer connection to and presence in horror has been theorized for decades, yet previous research emphasized the queer relationship to horror as being subtextual, allegorical, and figurative. This research undertook a groundbreaking study of the queer spectator of horror film, building upon theoretical discourse with empirical data to evidence that queer embodiment has ontological and phenomenological connections to the horror genre. This study gathered 4,107 survey participants and conducted 15 in-depth oral histories, leading to the presentation of the first empirical, comprehensive, and inclusive understanding of the queer spectator's horror opinions, habits, and tastes. The conclusion made by engaging and analyzing the quantitative and qualitative data results, simply stated, is that, to the queer spectator, horror is queer. The mixed-method data also evidences that a significant percentage of queer spectators actively and therapeutically engage with horror to work through their queer trauma and knowingly have a camp relationship to horror. Furthermore, this study establishes the importance of the queered presentation of horror films to queer audiences as live cinema screenings that feature live drag performance, investigated through case study examinations of Peaches Christ's Midnight Mass and Carla Rossi's Queer Horror. This interdisciplinary study makes overdue and impactful empirical contributions to the fields of queer, horror, trauma, camp, and live cinema studies. The investigations and conclusions of this study not only lead to the queer spectator of horror film being affirmed a place in academic discourse, but also function to make visible and galvanize the diverse community of horror-loving queers.

This work is dedicated to all the horror queerdos, gay ghouls, and queer creatures of the night—what music we make.

For Amie.

Table of Contents

Abstract	iii
Dedication	iv
Table of Contents	v
List of Figures	viii
Acknowledgements	x
Prologue	xiii
Chapter 1 Introduction	1
1.1 Collecting Empirical Data on Horror's Queer Spectators	2
1.2 The Horror Genre and the Queer Audience	5
1.3 Identity and the Queer Community	6
1.4 The Ontological Queerness of Film and Horror Film	11
1.5 The (Horrific) Queer Uncanny	14
1.6 Hauntology and Queer Identity	16
1.7 Queer Theory, Queerness, and Queer Scholarship	18
1.8 Queer Scholars' Impact on Horror Studies	23
1.9 Centering Queers and Queerness in Horror Studies	29
1.10 Inclusively Queer Methodological Approaches	36
1.11 The Queer Horror Spectator and Queer Liminality	44
Chapter 2 Methodology and Methods	48
2.1 A Queer Methodology and Queering Methods	49
2.2 Research Transparency and Statistical Interventions	51
2.3 Reconsidering Institutional Norms	54
2.4 Privacy, Protection, and Proximity in Data Management	60
2.5 Survey Design Methodology	63
2.6 Scope of Research	67
2.7 Participant Recruitment and Engagement	69
2.8 Data Characteristics and Considerations	73
2.9 Oral History Methodology	76
2.10 Interview Transcription Methods	80
2.11 Statistics within the Humanities	83
2.12 Instigations for Future Queer Research	90

Chapter 3 Portrait of a Queer Horror Fan	92
3.1 Queer Heterogeneity and Consensus	94
3.2 Demographics of Queer Spectators of Horror Film	96
3.2.1 Gender and Sexual Orientation Diversity of Queer Spectators	96
3.2.2 Racial/Ethnic Identifications	99
3.2.3 Educational Attainment and Age	101
3.3 The Othered Lens of Queerness	104
3.4 Monsters, Victims, and the Final Girl	112
3.5 Women and Queers Represented in Horror	115
3.6 Opinions, Habits, and Tastes of the Queer Horror Fan	117
3.6.1 Queer Spectators' Fan Status	117
3.6.2 Childhood Introduction to Horror	119
3.6.3 Horror as Interpersonal Connection	122
3.6.4 Queer Spectators' Knowledgeability of the Horror Genre	125
3.6.5 Queer Identities and Identifications as Queer	127
3.6.6 Queer Horror Spectators Compared with Female Horror Fans	131
3.6.7 Non-Cinematic Modes of Horror Consumption	134
3.6.8 Queer Spectators and International Horror	135
3.6.9 Cinemagoing and Queer Spectators	136
3.6.10 Horror Habits Beyond Film Spectatorship	137
3.6.11 Violence, Gore, and Tension	139
3.6.12 Horror Subgenres	140
3.6.13 The Favorite Horror Films of Queer Spectators	144
3.7 Summarizing the Queer Spectator of Horror Film	149
Chapter 4 Trauma and Camp	152
4.1 Connecting Trauma and the Horror Genre	153
4.2 Establishing Queer Trauma	156
4.3 The Horror Genre and Traumatic Expression	160
4.4 Evidencing Queer Trauma, Affect, and Catharsis	165
4.4.1 Trauma and the Affective Connection to Horror	167
4.4.2 Queer Catharsis and the Horror Film	171
4.4.3 Trauma and the Queer Lens	173
4.4.4 The Queer Trauma Connection to Slashers and Body Horror	174
4.5 Traumatic Expressions from Catharsis to Camp	176
4.6 Defining Camp as a Relationship	178

4.7 The Camp Relationship to Horror	179
4.8 Queering the Camp-Horror Nexus	182
4.9 Evidentiary Data on Queerness, Camp, and Horror	187
4.10 Camp Laughter as a Trauma Processor	196
4.11 The Potential of Camp	200
Chapter 5 Drag Me to Hell	203
5.1 Establishing Queer Performance as Live Cinema	205
5.2 The Phenomenology of Queer Live Cinema	211
5.2.1 Queer Liveness and Sharedness	211
5.2.2 Shared Queer Laughter	214
5.2.3 Queer Events as the Carnavalesque	216
5.3 The Cult of Queer Live Cinema	220
5.3.1 Defining Queer Live Cinema as Cult	220
5.3.2 Queer Failure Informs Cult Status	222
5.3.3 Connecting the Queer, Cult, and Horror through Rocky Horror	225
5.3.4 Foundations of Queer Horror Performance in San Francisco	226
5.4 Drag as Queer Performance	228
5.5 Drag Performers as Queer Live Cinema's Horror Hosts	232
5.6 Midnight Mass with your Hostess Peaches Christ	234
5.7 Welcome to Queer Horror	241
5.8 When Live Cinema Becomes a Significant Queer Event	246
5.9 Evidencing Queer Live Cinema with Empirical Data	251
5.10 Film as the Cinematic Church of Queer Community	256
5.11 The Future of Queer Live Cinema	258
Conclusion	260
Oral History Bibliography	269
Bibliography	271
Filmography	304
Appendix A	310
Appendix B	317
Appendix C	355

List of Figures

Chapter 2

2.1. Opening page of the online questionnaire	66
2.2. Survey recruitment flyer	74

Chapter 3

3.1. Graph of survey participants' gender identities	97
3.2. Graph of survey participants' sexual orientations	99
3.3. Graph of survey participants' racial and/or ethnic identities	99
3.4. Chart of country of residence by racial and/or ethnic identity	100
3.5. Chart of survey participants' level of education	101
3.6. Chart of survey participants' age	103
3.7. Graph of survey participants' identification in horror films	112
3.8. Chart comparing survey participants' identification in horror	113
3.9. Graph of survey participants' level of horror fandom	118
3.10. Graph of survey participants' length of horror fandom	119
3.11. Graph of when survey participants first started watching horror	122
3.12. Graph of what started survey participants' interest in horror	123
3.13. Graph of survey participants' international horror habits	135
3.14. Chart comparing queers' top horror subgenres with women	140
3.15. Chart of survey participants' top 25 favorite horror films	147
3.16. Gendered breakdown of survey participants' top 10 horror films	148

Chapter 4

4.1. Graph about horror films helping work through trauma	167
4.2. Graph about horror films and catharsis	173
4.3. Graph about enjoying "camp-y" horror films	187
4.4. Graph about horror films and laughter	196

Chapter 5

5.1. Portrait of Peaches Christ	208
5.2. Portrait of Carla Rossi	210
5.3. Martiny "Flawed is the New Fierce" t-shirt	224

5.4. Carla Rossi dressed in homage to Elvira at Queer Horror	233
5.5. Promotional material for Midnight Mass	235
5.6. Midnight Mass sweatshirt design	238
5.7. Midnight Mass Season of Horror Calendar	240
5.8. The original “Queer Horror” painting	242
5.9. Painting of Carla Rossi for a Queer Horror screening	243
5.10. Carla Rossi painted in tribute to Night of the Demons	246
5.11. “Peaches Christ Saved My Soul at Midnight Mass” sweatshirt	256

Acknowledgements

This project was completed where I live, the unceded and stolen traditional and ancestral lands of the Multnomah, Wasco, Cowlitz, Kathlamet, Clackamas, Watlala bands of the Chinook, the Tualatin Kalapuya, Molalla, Tumwater and other Tribes and bands who have lived and continue to live on and steward the lands that are now known as the Portland metropolitan area. Acknowledging and rendering visible the ongoing traumas of white settler colonialism on Indigenous peoples everywhere is an initial step toward a more equitable future.

This project is marked by personal, familial, national, and international traumas that also demand acknowledgment, as all cultural production is sociopolitically situated. The 2016 death of my brother punctuated the beginning of this doctoral endeavour. For nearly the entirety of this project, this country further fractured under a hateful leader and through a fraught US presidential election. As for many, 2020 was a very difficult and painful year personally, permeated by death, illness, and the coronavirus pandemic. Today, this country continues to struggle with increasing effects from misogyny, racism, homophobia, transphobia, Islamophobia, anti-semitism, and colonialism. This nation, at last, is having a much-needed racial reckoning and facing the truth that Black Lives Matter.

This study would not exist in its current form without the love, support, and guidance of numerous people, manifested in numerous ways. Anyone who helped me on this journey in any capacity, from sharing my queer horror survey to caring for Amie, I thank you.

Enthusiastically and specifically, I thank each and every one of the 4,107 survey participants and all of the oral history narrators: Gabe Castro, Harmony Colangelo, Lana Contreras, Jason Edward Davis, Mark Estes, Joe Fejeran, Joshua Grannell, Alex Hall, CJ Hodges, Anthony Hudson, Stacie Ponder, Kaitlyn Stodola, Kim Thompson, Michael Varrati, and Christopher Velasco. I am grateful you each took the time to share your knowledge, experience, and love of horror with me. This research would not exist without you.

My opportunity to conduct this research was bolstered by Katy Barber and Cris Paschild, who believed in my abilities to complete this doctoral journey and enthusiastically recommended me for it. Katy, thank you for teaching me to appreciate theory in a new way. Cris, your friendship and support throughout these years have been greatly appreciated.

I have the utmost gratitude for Brigid Cherry and Laura Westengard, scholars whose work informed this study. I appreciate that you each kindly accepted my request to meet with you early in my research and offered astute advice and warm support.

To my academic advisory team: Thank you for the intellectual guidance, emotional support, and the editorial pushes that improved this work.

Andrew Moor, even with limited time, our meetings proved potent, with you guiding me to both a few key scholars and the burgeoning field of live cinema studies. I hope we have more time together in the future.

Xavier Aldana Reyes, I don't quite understand how one human accomplishes as much as you do, as spectacularly as you do, whilst being one of the sweetest humans I've known—'How very dare you!'

Linnie Blake, these years working together have seen us share homes and make memories through illnesses, surgeries, births, and deaths. Your wit and sense of humor have buoyed me throughout this project—I'm so grateful that you agreed to lead me through this monumental endeavor.

Thanks to everyone who has been helpful during my MMU experience: Sue Baines, Deborah Bown, Matthew Carter, Rachel Fell, Matthew Foley, Emma Liggins, Sorcha Ní Fhlainn, Muzna Rahman, and Rebecca Wynne-Walsh.

I am grateful and thankful to my family and friends who offered encouragement and love through this journey, helping in numerous ways both related to my studies and, importantly, not: Kate Burn, Christina Carlsson, Nicole Dittmer, Baby Djojonegoro, Kristina Downes, Kelly Duncan, the Fierce Read Book Club, Addie Humbert, Hildy Miller, Irene Neumansky, Sandra Owusu, Paulina Palmer, Julie Pascal, Nancy Pascal, Lisa Petrocelli, Thea Petrocelli, my Queer for Fear online community, Clarissa Rojas, Dan Schechter, and Jeanne Snodgrass.

I send much thanks to Kerry Gorrill. You've fed me, housed me, counseled me, and made me laugh through it all. My PhD experience would have been much duller and more painful without your (and, of course, Bill's) friendship, support, and trifle.

To my Ma, Virginia Downes: thank you for never discouraging my love of horror and always being an example of and instilling in me unceasing intellectual curiosity.

Finally, to Amie: words can't do justice to how I feel about you and what your support has meant. You are the warmest, kindest, and most thoughtful person I know, loving me for who I am. We have already supported each other through so much in our years together, but getting through this year, helplessly watching COVID-19 steal your vitality and health, has been nearly unbearable. I wanted to give up on this project at times, but you gave your all to keep me going. Quite simply, this work would not exist without you and your unconditional love. There is no other human I would rather share life with because even through all the challenges and trauma—and Grrrl, the trauma is real—we always find a way to laugh through it all.

Prologue

Language shifts, word meanings change, and social sensibilities evolve; therefore, the queer identifying words, terms, and markers used in this study may become outdated with time or even may not be preferred by some members of the queer community today. Due to being focused on nonnormative subjectivities, this study and document could potentially present demographic or community terms that do not feel right or appropriate for (or that even feel offensive to) some individuals. My approaches that informed this study and my actions that created it are founded with respect for individual subjectivities and differences in the words we choose to describe ourselves. My intentions and attention are squarely focused on dismantling the misogynistic, racist, homophobic, transphobic, and ableist societal institutions and systems that hurt our communities. I believe this focus (rather than solely attending to individual words and behaviors) to be most productive because the culture wars and “cancel culture,” which run rampant at the time of this study and writing, reflect the fracturing function of neoliberal identity politics. About this, Jack Halberstam astutely remarks:

In queer communities today, while we fight about words like ‘tranny,’ worry about being triggered, and ‘call each other out’ for our supposed microcrimes of omission/inclusion/slang, we are, like the People’s Front of Judea, trying to fight power by battling over the relations between signifiers and signifieds while leaving the structures of signification itself intact (2018, 16).

I remain sensitive to others in my community while being resolutely focused on deconstructing the systems that ultimately harm us. The COVID-19 pandemic that has disproportionately harmed numerous marginalized communities still ravages the world as I complete this writing in June 2021; however, many cities and regions are slowly opening back up and there are ever-increasing calls to return back to the pre-pandemic “normal.” I hope that we, instead, work together to create a different and more equitable way forward.

Chapter 1

Introduction:

Theoretical and Ontological Frameworks

I believe horror is queer because it's always the perspective of an outsider. As queer people, we've always been on the side. Y'all are not us. We haven't been part of the majority culture. So, in essence, we do see a lot of our perspective in the main characters trying to survive, you know, and that's what I find very appealing. And I think that there's a lot of parallel between the reality of a queer person and the reality of someone in a horror film (Contreras 2020, 20-21).

Without queerness—which includes drag, camp, and being othered—you don't have a lot of the horror that the straight horror bros tend to take for granted. It's the fact that they just don't like to take their claws off what they feel has been theirs, but it's always been ours and we're clawing back and our claws are sharper 'cause we've had years to grind them up on our anger, our frustration, and our denial of just being who we are. So we're coming out of the shadows. We're coming out of closets. We're coming from under the beds. We're coming to take back what's ours and y'all just need to be ready for it (Estes 2020, 37).

I think queers engage with horror in a way that's different from heterosexuals in that we inherently understand that this is our genre (Varrati 2020, 17).

In “Proudly Setting Trends: The 2015 LGBT Consumer Report,” the internationally recognized global information, data, and measurement company Nielsen revealed that 43 percent of LGBT<sup>1</sup> moviegoers prefer to see horror movies in the theatre, which is 67 percent more than non-LGBT moviegoers. The report states, moreover, that LGBT moviegoers were 50 percent more likely than their heterosexual counterparts to name horror as a favorite film genre (Nielsen 2015). Whilst this confirms the anecdotal truism that a statistically significant number of queer<sup>2</sup> community members both enjoy and actively seek <sup>1</sup> The acronym LGBT stands for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender, which was GLAAD's preferred initialism until 2016, when they shifted to use the more inclusive LGBTQ+ acronym, adding Queer and a plus sign to encompass the extensive nonnormative sexuality and gender spectrum. GLAAD was formerly known as Gay & Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation; the organization changed the name in 2013 to GLAAD to be inclusive of all nonnormative genders and sexualities. Since Nielsen is not a queer organization it is likely they look to a queer organization such as GLAAD to set the terms. Indeed, Nielsen's later publications reflect this updated identification (“LGBTQ+ Gamers are an Untapped Demographic” released October 13, 2020).

---

<sup>2</sup> This study prefers and privileges the umbrella term “queer” over LGBTQA+ (Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, Queer, Asexual, plus others) to represent the full spectrum of nonnormative sexualities and genders, as will be discussed in this study, in part because the term queer is uniquely suited to the nonnormative horror fan. As Alexander Doty positions, “I am using the term ‘queer’ to mark a flexible space for the expression of all aspects of non- (anti-, contra-) straight cultural production and reception” (1993, 3). To be explicit and leave no room for confusion, this study's survey participants and oral history narrators are myriad combinations out horror films, little else is known about the viewing patterns, practices, tastes, appropriations, and relationships of the queer spectator with regards to horror film. Certainly, the queer community has had a relationship with the horror genre—both in the production and consumption of horror film—for as long as the horror genre has existed. Although biographies and documentaries about queer horror filmmakers from James Whale to Mark Patton have established a sense of queered horror history, almost nothing is known about queer horror spectators.<sup>3</sup> This study is predicated on the assertion, therefore, that even though “doing empirical audience studies is cumbersome, time consuming, and it requires resources” (Kjeldsen 2018, 4), engaging queer horror spectators directly becomes imperative to understand the importance of the horror genre to queer people and, in turn, foreground queer voices in academic critique of the genre. For “whilst socio-political readings of Horror are necessary,” as Xavier Aldana Reyes claims, “they hardly ever cover the experiential side of Horror” (2016, 134). Even though “audience studies are inordinately time consuming and labor-intensive” (Brunt 1992, 69) they are, I will argue, the preeminent means of understanding both the genre and its significance to its consumers.

1.1 Collecting Empirical Data on Horror’s Queer Spectators

To have the substantial and adequate data set, quantitative and qualitative (mixed method) results, that is necessary to mine and thus to understand queer spectatorship of horror film, I created a 66-question survey that garnered thousands of participants, producing the largest study on the queer spectator of horror film and likely the largest academic audience study of the horror genre. In order to extend understanding about both horror film and queer audiences, my work here will center<sup>4</sup> the quantitative and qualitative empirical data of over 4,100 queer people—the largest study of horror spectators ever conducted. This survey response rate is all the more impressive when considering that “people of queer identities, including gay, lesbian, bisexual, asexual, polyamorous, cisgender, transgender, nonbinary, genderqueer, agender, and much more. While many participants and narrators self-identify as queer, I am designating all LGBTQ+ horror spectators as queer, which will be later explained to be an apt label for this group of horror fans.

---

<sup>3</sup> James Whale: A New World of Gods and Monsters, by James Curtis, was first published in 1982 and the Academy Award-winning film about James Whale, Gods and Monsters, directed by Bill Condon, was released in 1998. Scream, Queen! My Nightmare on Elm Street (2019) is about Mark Patton, the actor who played Jesse Walsh in A Nightmare on Elm Street 2: Freddy’s Revenge (1985), and his painful personal journey with this film.

<sup>4</sup> Since the queer community exists at the periphery of mainstream society, this choice to center queer voices and perspectives in this study is an explicit and political decision.

are less willing to answer a lengthy questionnaire than a brief one” (Austin 1989, 10). Indeed, the overwhelming success of this in-depth 66-question survey speaks volumes about the significant relationship between queers and horror. Throughout this study, in a direct and purposeful act to elevate queer horror spectators’ voices, I present and analyze quantitative and qualitative data from queer survey participants and queer oral history narrators who provided in-depth interviews that uncover understandings of and meanings behind their relationship with the horror genre.<sup>5</sup> Taken together, this collected data set creates the most complete portrait of queer spectators of horror to date and serves as evidence of the sui generis nature of the relationship that queers have to the horror genre. This study fills, therefore, a gap in academic and theoretical discourse by creating a research project that focuses on queer spectatorship of horror film in a viewing context in which queer fandom itself occupies “a liminal position on the fringes of both gay culture and the horror community” (Scales 2015, 201). This research does so by building on, and moving beyond, the spectator scholarship of academics such as Brigid Cherry who, in 1999, examined the viewing pleasures and fan practices of female horror film audiences. My addition to the limited scholarship on horror spectatorship is both felicitous and vital due to the queer community’s increased visibility in horror as well as horror film’s growing legitimacy.<sup>6</sup> Films such as The Babadook (2014), The Witch (2015), Get Out (2017), and Hereditary (2018) brought a renewed era of critical acclaim to the genre, a period which also saw the release of explicitly queer horror films such as Rift (2017), Thelma (2017), The Perfection (2018), Knife+Heart (2018), Bit (2019), and Spiral (2020).<sup>7</sup> This study eschews

---

<sup>5</sup> Throughout this study, the phrase “survey participant(s)” refers to the 4,107 queer horror spectators who completed the online questionnaire, whereas the phrases “oral history narrator(s)” or “narrator(s)” refer to the 15 individuals with whom I conducted one-on-one recorded interviews. When referencing all queer people who love horror film based on statistical extrapolation and inference, the terms “queer horror spectators,” “queer spectators of horror,” “horror-loving queers,” or “queer horror fans” are used. Queer people, to be absolutely clear, are not a homogeneous population; even with strong statistical evidence, the findings of this study do not uniformly apply to all queer spectators nor all queer spectators of horror. Stated differently, as will be discussed further, the study’s data evidences that a disproportionately large population of queers have a distinctively queer relationship with the horror genre that is developed through idiosyncratic combinations of horror films. Reporting the commonalities found in the horror-loving queer population, as evidenced through the mixed-method data, is privileged over differences throughout this study.

<sup>6</sup> For example, The New York Times reported in 2017 that horror film hit an apex in box office popularity.

<sup>7</sup> To emphasize the collaborative nature of filmmaking, films in this study will be referenced by title and release date, as opposed to the format of this work’s style guide, The Chicago Manual of Style, which uses director name. See the filmography (page 304) to locate the complete citation for each mentioned film.

the mainstream critical terminology “elevated horror”<sup>8</sup> because it ignores “horror film’s long history of critically engaging with social issues” (Pinedo 2020, 96) and it obscures an important reason audiences are further consuming horror at the box office: the increasingly inclusive representation of women, Black, Indigenous, and People of Color (BIPOC),<sup>9</sup> and/or queers as performers, directors, and producers. Oral history narrators Gabe Castro and Kim Thompson speak directly to this inclusive era of horror, stating:

We’re in, luckily, this time where people are confronting the way that they’re being seen or portrayed, we’re trying to be a little more purposeful in representing certain voices and elevating them. . . . Having someone like Jordan Peele who can create Get Out which is just phenomenal in itself and in being a social-horror piece. But to also be able to back that up with Us, which is a film about classism, but featuring a Black family who just exists as a family. Like it doesn’t have to be about race. . . . And, you know, seeing more women popping up, even seeing some Latinx people popping up, and getting that support and to be able to tell those stories . . . We’ve had enough white men telling those stories—and they’ve done a pretty bad job in the past trying to tell the stories of others (Castro 2020, 9-10).

There’s a message in the fact that there are these very incredible women who are directors coming to the forefront—or anybody who is directing horror who isn’t a cishet white male who is making a film now—who is making a film that people are excited about because it’s something we’ve never seen before. I think what that is communicating is that perhaps it’s time to give a platform to those communities that haven’t really had the opportunity to tell horror from their perspective. And the reason that we’re interested in and excited is because these peoples’ perspectives are completely different because they don’t exist at the top of the food chain of the patriarchy and will not make a film in the way that a cishet white dude’s going to make a horror film. We’re not talking about the same thing because the same things aren’t horrific to us (Thompson 2020, 16).

Oral history narrator CJ Hodges directly foregrounds the queer spectator’s passion about horror’s growing inclusivity, stating: “I’m very attached to these new movies” (2020, 22). The rise of inclusive horror not only engages and renders visible an ever-increasing number of queer horror makers, but also provides more filmic content embraced by queer spectators, all of which demonstrates that queer spectators of horror are positively responding to the shifts and changes within horror in the twenty-first century.

---

<sup>8</sup> Examples of mainstream critical usage of the term elevated horror, see David Church’s book Post-Horror: Art, Genre and Cultural Elevation (2021) and the following articles: “This Was the Decade Horror Got ‘Elevated’” (Bradley 2019); “How ‘The Witch’ Accidentally Launched a Horror Movement” (Crump 2019); “Forget ‘Tenet’: British Horror ‘Saint Maud’ Is the Film That Should Tempt You Back to the Cinema” (Bilmes 2020); and “Is Horror the Most Disrespected Genre?” (Barber 2018).

<sup>9</sup> BIPOC is an acronym umbrella term employed to represent the collective racialized experience of people of color within sociopolitical systems that privilege the white experience and uphold white supremacy. When addressing BIPOC individuals’ experiences, I will use their self-identified racial and ethnic embodiment.

1.2 The Horror Genre and the Queer Audience

Although the definition of what, precisely, constitutes a horror film has lain at the heart of horror criticism since its inception, the transgressive and affective nature of the horror genre has made it resistant to “water-tight definitions” (Neale 2000, 85). Regardless of any strict or collective consensus on the definition of what constitutes a horror film, the genre, nonetheless, has a communicative shorthand, which is an “implicit conception of the language of the genre” (Tudor 1989, 4). The generic language of horror, therefore, is not a strictly codified process, but instead an inferred understanding by the spectator.<sup>10</sup> Tudor theorizes genre as a reception concept when he argues that “genre is what we collectively believe it to be” (2003, 7). Someone recognizing the language of horror in a film is, I argue, viewing a horror film. The aim of this study is not, therefore, to define horror. Neither will this study play gatekeeper on research participants’ individual definitions or understandings of horror. Such restrictions and boundaries only serve to undermine the transgressive, queer nature of horror itself, which this study investigates more in detail. In a study such as this one, that privileges the audience over the text, I follow Cherry in asserting that “any definition of the genre is bound to be irrelevant since the individual viewers taking part in study [sic] will undoubtedly hold their own ideas of what films constitute the boundaries of horror” (1999, 29-30). Distilled down to its simplest form, empirical evidence is about engaging audiences, individual people who form a community of interest, to discuss and collect data about their embodied experiences as horror spectators. As such, this study is grounded in the experiential side of horror—my own experiences, the survey participants’ experiences, the interview narrators’ experiences, my academic supervisory teams’ experiences, and the experience of research readers. For whilst critics like Harry Benshoff and Sean Griffin may observe that “for generations, queer audiences have also been fascinated with horror films” (2006, 75), there had never been a large-scale study that engages the full spectrum of queer horror spectators and documented their opinions, habits, and tastes. Heeding Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim’s “call to action,” I have built “a productive, plentiful, powerful, and pleasurable queer worldmaking and livability project” of my own to do so (2019, 23). Beyond presenting the most complete picture to date about queer horror spectators, this study additionally and importantly helps to queer the burgeoning field of live cinema. As defined by Sarah Atkinson and Helen W. Kennedy, live cinema is “an umbrella term through which to capture the broad range of emergent creative art practices and novel commercial strategies” (2018, x). This study situates case studies on Peaches Christ’s Midnight Mass and Carla Rossi’s Queer Horror in the appropriate cultural context and within live cinema studies, underscoring queer contributions to this mode of cultural engagement. This expansion demonstrates how Midnight Mass and Queer Horror are acts of “queering” heterosexual spaces with horror film exhibition that include live pre-shows and consider the audience experiences at these screenings. Live cinema studies is a nascent academic field that, until this study, had yet to explicitly and empirically engage with queer individuals and reckon with queer identity.

---

<sup>10</sup> Horror is also a term used in marketing and by movie studios or streaming platforms, which illustrates how genre can be a useful signpost for people to find a particular type of content.

1.3 Identity and the Queer Community

Any work centered on identity needs to confront the use of identity politics as a tool of neoliberalism to erode people’s sense of class consciousness.<sup>11</sup> This fact does not invalidate identity-based research; it just means that, as the work’s author, I must acknowledge that identity politics do not encapsulate the complete human subjective experience in society or indeed the economic determinants that shape both experience and identity.<sup>12</sup> Regardless, identity does matter, for “identities and memories are not things we think about, but

---

<sup>11</sup> In The Political Unconscious: Narrative as a Socially Symbolic Act, Fredric Jameson argues for the necessity of Marxist and cultural materialist readings of cultural artifacts, reiterating Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels’s manifesto that class struggles are society’s “fundamental history” (1981, 20).

<sup>12</sup> Most specifically, identity politics do not epitomize the economic determinants of that experience. Nor do identity politics engage directly with intersectionality, the theoretical model that explains how class, race, sex, gender, sexuality, ability, etc. simultaneously interconnect to create differing individual experiences of sociopolitical privilege and/or discrimination (Crenshaw 1989).

things we think with" (Gillis 1994, 5; italics in the original). While individualistic neoliberal capitalism erodes the function of the collective and communities, this study aims to create a sense of community, even if it is an "imagined community," a perceived grouping based on a collective identity that is always intertwined with sociopolitical and historical forces (Anderson 2006, 6). My imagined community of queer horror spectators functions in opposition to both the destructive forces of the cisheteropatriarchy<sup>13</sup> and the fracturing tide of neoliberal capitalism. To borrow Jack Halberstam's sharp rationale: "Rather than remaining invested in an identitarian set of conflicts that turn on small differences and individual hurts, let us rather wage battle against the violent imposition of economic disparity and forcefully oppose a renewed and open investment in white supremacy and American imperial ambition transacted through the channels of globalization" (2018, 126). My imagined queer horror community is filled with difference yet still united in our queerness, with our differences as a source of strength. In other words, this study privileges the collective community of queer horror spectators over the individual queer horror fan, emphasizing the value of community over the goals and gains of the individual. As Henry A. Giroux heeds, "neoliberalism produces a notion of individualism and anti-intellectualism that harbors a pathological disdain for community" (2021, 91). This research, thus, philosophically holds an anti-neoliberal praxis that maintains the positive power of community by centering the collective consensus evidenced by the data, whilst, at times, highlighting intersectional individualisms in order to underscore simultaneously that distinct facets of our identities are socially and historically relevant. This study dispels ideological tensions arising between a collective community consensus and individual identity differences by discerning that a disparate group of queer people from various intersectional embodiments can still find "social solidarity and collective obligation" within the queer horror community and thereby undermine the fracturing effects of neoliberal individualism (Giroux 2021, 35). As theorist David M. Halperin declares: "Queer is by definition

---

<sup>13</sup> The cisheteropatriarchy is the manifestation and institutionalization of cisgender heterosexual men designed to uphold their social dominance. "Cisheteropatriarchy propagates the idea that biology naturally drives sex, gender, and sexuality, further perpetuating systematic and social scripts of patriarchy and biological determination" (Alim et al. 2020, 293). As white supremacist ideology and patriarchal domination are intrinsic to cisheteropatriarchy and cisheteronormativity, even if not repeatedly mentioned throughout this study, these constructed notions should be understood to be integral to the cisheteropatriarchal system.

whatever is at odds with the normal, the legitimate, the dominant. . . . a positionality vis-à-vis the normative” (1995, 62; italics in the original). Relatedly, narrator Stacie Ponder reflects on queerness as an existence created outside the norm:

Queerness puts you out of step with society because we’re told that there’s a certain path that we’re supposed to take from birth to grave basically. Queerness automatically puts you out of step with that and therefore it kind of changes everything around you because you just see things differently. You have to figure out how you fit into life when the prescribed life path doesn’t work for you (2020, 19).

While there are various ways to designate and name the community under study, I employ and embody the term “queer,” a labeling that is in direct opposition to the exclusionary limitations of gay and lesbian and the disembodied sterility of the acronym LGBTQA+ (Case 1991, 3).<sup>14</sup>

Reclaiming the word queer is not only personal and political, but also perfectly suited for the horror spectator, for the “queer is the taboo-breaker, the monstrous, the uncanny” (Case 1991, 3). This research employs the term queer to represent embodied subjectivities that transgress cisheterosexual norms, most specifically but not exclusively nonnormative sexualities (i.e., not heterosexual) and/or genders (i.e., not cisgender or binaristic genders) and their intersections. Queer—as a noun, an adjective, and a verb—continually foments transgression and multiplicity, thereby offering nonnormative alterity. The utilization of the term queer in a disembodied context (i.e., usage not related to nonnormative sexuality or gender variances) is to represent the broader existence that transgresses cisheteronormative norms. As Gust Yep explains: “Heteronormativity, as the invisible center and the presumed bedrock of society, is the quintessential force creating, sustaining, and perpetuating the erasure, marginalization, disempowerment, and oppression of sexual others” (2003, 18). For as long as cisheteronormativity is the enforced dominant societal state and queers are forced to exist within cisheteronormative power structures, queer theory (and queer embodied realities) not only retains its sociopolitical charge, but also offers possibilities for legitimacy outside the norm. While research participants may express their queerness or understanding of queerness differently, they fundamentally share that misalignment with normative society, a society in which “heteronormativity makes heterosexuality hegemonic through the process of normalization” (Yep 2003, 18). The queer community’s sense of unity in part stems from growing up in a cisgender, heterosexual dominant society, not in a queer community (unlike common upbringings within ethnic and racial communities). As Ghaziani notes, with respect to Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick: “Compared to racial and ethnic groups, queer communities lack a clear sense of ancestral linearity (Sedgwick 1990). The absence of awareness—who are my people?—induces collective amnesia about our lives. This is one of the most insidious and painful forms of homophobia” (2019, 114). Richard Dyer further explains, “as gays, we grew up isolated not only from our heterosexual peers but also from each other” (1977, 1); since most queers grow up in binaristic cisheterosexual familial units, we have to find our own way to or make our own queer community.<sup>15</sup> We have to construct our community, our chosen family. Queers are further bonded by the fact that we “are understood as belonging to a permanent minority that perpetually replenishes but never comes close to a majority” (Galt and Schoonover 2016, 167).

---

<sup>14</sup> This survey was designed and identified as a queer project from the start, with promotional materials asking if potential participants were “Queer for Fear?” As well, the survey’s introduction stated: “The goal of this research project is to understand the habits, tastes, opinions, and experiences of queer fans of horror.”

While queers will always be a small minority,<sup>16</sup> we are everywhere and nowhere. We are visible and invisible. Gloria Anzaldúa developed thinking on this, writing that: “Being the supreme crossers of cultures, homosexuals have strong bonds with the queer white, Black, Asian, Native American, Latino, and with the queer in Italy, Australia and the rest of the planet. We come from all colors, all classes, all races, all time periods” (1987, 84-85). Anzaldúa’s words <sup>15</sup> Importantly, intersectionality may complicate feelings and understandings about one’s identity markers. For example, narrator Joe Fejeran touches on the homophobic legacy of colonialism for his CHamoru identity, whilst simultaneously remarking that his queer identity is rooted in a system of white supremacy: “The one thing I’ll say is that I feel that I connect more with my queer identity marker than I do my indigenous CHamoru identity marker. And that’s been something that’s been kind of this internal conflict in the last few years. It was also further complicated by my most recent trip to Guam where it’s like, how can I reconcile this culture and identity that still has its roots in all of these other things, but at the same time, you know, how do I reconcile that with my queer identity and the community of queer folks. Then simultaneously with my queer identity—all of it is rooted in a Western context, and in terms of media and cultural artifacts that are being consumed, a lot of it is from a very cis white perspective. Those are constantly things that I’m unpacking in terms of my own personal identity” (2020, 13).

---

<sup>16</sup> The total population of both queer horror spectators and the LGBTQ+ community are unknowable since the data on the LGBTQ+ population varies, particularly because it is not safe for all queer people to publicly declare or report their identity. For example, queer population estimates in the United States (US) fluctuate from 3.5 percent to 12 percent depending on the reporting institution. The Annenberg Foundation and USC Annenberg Inclusion Initiative report that 3.5 percent of the US population identifies as LGB (2018, 21); the UCLA School of Law Williams Institute reports that 4.5 percent of the US population self-identify as LGBT (2019, n.p.); and GLAAD and The Harris Poll’s Accelerating Acceptance reports that 12 percent of Americans identify as LGBTQ (2017, 3).

reiterate how queerness is a diverse yet unifying identity marker. Queers' very existence is a threat to the cisheteropatriarchy—to cisheteronormativity—"a world system that naturalizes its own dominance and far-reaching proliferation as a theory of human life" (Galt and Schoonover 2016, 23), a system which is intrinsically linked to and the creator of neoliberal capitalism. Indeed, the establishment and dominance of cisheterosexuality is predicated on the constructed societal fear of the queer, a subjectivity which needs to be abjected in order for the normative to be instated and affirmed.<sup>17</sup> This study's goal is to simultaneously highlight the data about queer horror spectators and create initial space to discuss how intersectional differences within the queer community shift data results and embodied experiences.<sup>18</sup> In other words, while this study privileges queerness—whereas Cherry "privileged gender" (1999, 213)—that privilege will not "override difference in the pursuit of sameness" (Whatling 1997, 12). To that end, this research, based on a diverse spectrum of survey participants and narrators, not only amplifies our voices and legitimizes our experiences, but also provides a rationale for the understanding that horror itself is queer. To emphasize this claim on the genre, Shudder's 2020 Comic-Con@Home panel, on July 23, was aptly titled "Horror is Queer." This study demonstrates that horror is resoundingly queer, with the ways in which queer spectators connect to the genre being distinctive, and that horror acts, in narrator Jason Edward Davis's words, as an "access to queerness" (2020, 11). Narrator Joe Fejeran clarifies how horror can be part of identity formation: "Horror has been a way for me to know more about myself. It's been a way for me to know more about the rest of the world" (2020, 40). Repeatedly, the words of the survey participants and oral history narrators collectively and directly shed light on this emotional connection between genre and identity. As narrator Mark

---

<sup>17</sup> This exact dynamic upholds the structure of white supremacy, which normalizes whiteness and renders the non-white as the feared and subjugated Other.

<sup>18</sup> Since this research has created and presents the first empirical understanding of queer spectators of horror film, I purposefully and actively center the cohesive narrative of queer horror spectatorship. This cohesive narrative focuses on and explicates the majority findings and shared stories found in the quantitative and qualitative data, rather than examining more nuanced intersectional differences. Yet, indisputably, the queer community is certainly not devoid of racism, misogyny, classism, and ableism, with race particularly informing intersectional perspectives and experiences. In other words, queer BIPOC horror fans are subject to society's, and certainly fandom's, white supremacist structures. Kevin Leo Yabut Nadal pointedly explains: "For decades, LGBTQ people of color (LGBTQPOC) have described how experiences of racism within mainstream LGBTQ communities are often dismissed or invalidated and how racial hierarchies within White-dominant LGBTQ communities are pervasive, but unspoken about" (2020, 41).

Estes explains, “It seems like there’s some type of freedom within horror for us queer people. It’s some type of freedom” (2020, 16).

1.4 The Ontological Queerness of Film and Horror Film

Identifying the ontological nature of film as being queer explains the queer spectator’s distinctive relationship to the horror genre and augments further understanding of that relationship. Stated differently, this study clarifies the queer nature of film and recognizes the significance of this shared connection for queer spectators in their relationship to horror. The idiosyncratic and interconnected relationships between film, horror, and queerness is an undelineated interconnectivity that illuminates film as a queer medium and horror as the queerest film genre.<sup>19</sup> As argued by Galt and Schoonover: “It is crucial to affirm that cinema is not simply a neutral host for LGBT representations but is, rather, a queerly inflected medium. To adapt Jasbir Puar’s terminology, we understand cinema as a queer assemblage” (2016, 6).<sup>20</sup> Succinctly restated, film is a queer medium. The ontological nature of film specifically speaks to the queer experience in a way that differs from how it may speak to and for other Others<sup>21</sup> in our society: workers, women, and BIPOC, as Robin Wood defines, with queer people, as the Others “of white patriarchal bourgeois culture” (2003, 160).<sup>22</sup> A primary claim of this study is not only that

---

<sup>19</sup> LGBTQ+ films do not comprise a genre or subgenre, but a category of film under different genres, such as horror, romantic comedy, drama, documentary, and so on.

<sup>20</sup> Schoonover and Galt elaborate on the thinking behind this assertion: “Politics infuses sex, and cinema is the place where this intertwining of the intimate and the public can be visibly registered. Cinema does not merely offer a convenient institutional space of distribution and exhibition in LGBT film festivals and cosmopolitan art houses. Rather, it produces queer identification, desire, and figurability as a constituent feature of the medium” (2016, 7).

<sup>21</sup> My understanding of the Other is informed, in part, by Edward Said’s Orientalism (1978). At its simplest, the term Orientalism refers to a discourse that constructs and projects a representation of the “Orient” in the consciousness of the West, a discourse that continually reiterates European/Western superiority (7). Orientalism is a Western “us” otherizing an Eastern “them.” This conveys an oversimplified summary of Said’s theory and Orientalism’s thesis, a thesis that answers the underlying critical question of how and why Westerners have like-minded notions when they think of the Arabo-Islamic Eastern world (a region that is neither homogeneous or static). In other words, Westerners view the Middle East, Asia, and North Africa through a distorted lens in which “the Oriental is irrational, depraved (fallen), childlike, ‘different;’ thus the European is rational, virtuous, mature, ‘normal’” (40). The West’s explicit creation (a constructed process) of the exotic Other provides a stark contrast to its norm, rendering the people of the Orient as “an object of study” (96), one that is dehumanized and silent. The white cisheterosexual construction of the deprived, silenced, and dehumanized Other informs this study’s understanding of the queer Other.

<sup>22</sup> The premise of this study is that queer spectators connect to horror because they recognize in the genre an intrinsic queerness. While women, BIPOC, people with disabilities, and the economically disadvantaged also may connect to the horror genre because of or with the lens of their status as societal Others, their connections differ from the queer connection to horror. For example, a Black gay man and a Black heterosexual man share the fundamental experience of horror is a queer genre, then, but is in fact the queerest genre in cinema because both the aesthetics of horror and its representation of the Other are intrinsically transgressive.<sup>23</sup> Queers find kinship in horror since their individual queerness transgresses societal taboos and, as Cyndy Hendershot confirms, “horror film is a genre that operates within a framework of taboo and transgression” (2001, 25). Queers identify with “transgressive behaviour” (47108917)<sup>24</sup> represented in the horror genre since “queer identity is transgressive” (47112447). As a survey participant writes, “growing up queer gives me more of a natural appreciation for the transgressive and monstrous in horror” (47121814). These participants’ comments explicitly illustrate how queers directly identify with “horror’s violation of taboos” and recognize that “the power of horror lies in its transgressive nature” (Jones 2018, 13). The claim that horror is queer is strengthened by the words of this study’s oral history narrators, who unequivocally hold ideas that connect queerness with the spaces, themes, and motifs in horror films and, indeed, the horror genre itself. I posit that a significant number of queer spectators of horror films understand the horror genre to be a queer genre, based on the unequivocal declaration by all 15 of the oral history narrators, including the following quotes from Alex Hall, Anthony Hudson, Gabe Castro, Jason Edward Davis, Michael Varrati, Harmony Colangelo, and Joe Fejeran:

Because it explores the Other, obviously, in that regard, horror has been always super, super queer. The fact that the monster is always subjugated to dark small closet-y spaces—the basement, the attics, the closet. And just the fear of the monstrous body, too, speaks to queerness in a very visceral way (Hall 2020, 14).

Horror is a queer art form, not a subgenre. Horror is . . . the entire systemic oppressions as Black men in a white supremacist society; however, they recognize and connect with the horror genre in different ways because the Black gay man’s perspectives and connections to horror are inseparable from his queerness, an intersectionality that a heterosexual man does not have. To this, narrator Mark Estes explains that the ability to connect with horror fans who were both Black and queer, sharing his intersectional perspective, was affirming and galvanizing: “I cannot believe that I found this group of people who love horror that’s Black. And then later on, through them, I found the Black queer horror fans and that’s when everything just came together for me” (2020, 16-17).

---

<sup>23</sup> Both queer people and horror films are “punished” for their nonnormative transgressions. Queers suffer personal abuses, institutional discrimination, and anti-queer legislation, among other societal aggressions. Similarly, horror films are not only censored and banned at familial/community and national levels, but also considered by film scholars and critics to form a lowly genre.

<sup>24</sup> The 8-digit codes used as citation credit throughout this study are the unique anonymous identifiers for the survey participants. I have included the citation codes to establish a sense of contributor individuality and so that researchers may learn and connect the participants who had multiple responses cited.

genre of horror itself is the queerness. You know this, but it is a site, and it is a genre, and it is a theme, and an aesthetic that was created by queer makers. And it's all about longing for the Other, or identifying with Other, or being made Other, like Frankenstein. I mean this is so basic, so 101, but Frankenstein is born a monster. It's outside of his will. Society has named him a monster and made him a monster (Hudson 2020, 12).

I think horror is queer. And I also think it's a home for any of us who consider ourselves the Other or different—and needing to live through that or feel like you're not the only one who's living through that. Because you can kind of see yourself on either side of that story of the protagonists and the villain and live through all the emotions that we're going through (Castro 2020, 7).

I mean, horror is queerness. From the very first horror films, it was about queerness, and it'll always be about the Other. It'll always be about destroying the nuclear family, the status quo, structures that are in place. It'll always be about something being outside of that, breaking shit up. It is queer. The physical intimacy of it is queer. Even in the violence people are being penetrated in ways that they have not defined as the way they thought they would be penetrated (Davis 2020, 29-30).

I think everybody who loves horror loves horror, and that's never in question. But I think our [queer] connection with it is different because we feel it baked in somehow—it's like it is baked into our essence. If you are a queer horror fan, it is because we love horror, but it's also because we're queer, because we get both of those things and the DNA of both of them is intertwined (Varrati 2020, 18).

I think the horror community has always been queer. But it's always been subtly queer enough that a lot of people who don't read it that way and don't want to admit that it is. Obviously queer people are in the know and they'll be like, 'Oh yeah, fucking vampires, they're all gay. Every single one of them—they're all gay.' Like Dracula's is a punk ass—the real Dracula was always Carmilla. Lesbian. Bye. At its core horror has always been queer (Colangelo 2020, 23).

Horror is intrinsically queer. And, at that time, I didn't know about the early directors—like Frankenstein—I didn't know about James Whale. I didn't know about that. I didn't know about those men. And it's been really interesting to kind of discover that and be like, yeah, this is very queer. It is very queer the queerness as a genre is talking about very politically, very queer things and dealing with isolation and being an outsider and all of that (Fejeran 2020, 20).

The interviews, combined with the survey results, evidence that queers understand horror to be a queer genre, engage with horror as a queer genre, and claim horror as a queer genre. As a survey participant notes, “so much of the gothic/horror genre has been *born* from queerness, outsidership, and queer creators in general. The genre is fundamentally built on a queer foundation” (47085220). Queer spectators connect to horror through shared status as societal transgressions and the figurative Other, as well as through a queer trauma and a camp relationship (established and detailed in Chapter 4). When this study attends to the Other, it attends to the worlds of both queerness and horror; to be queer is to be an Other who exists in opposition to the mainstream, causing societal unease, which is reflected in horror films.<sup>25</sup> Horror “fashions a space in which challenges to the status quo and non-normative bodies, identities, expressions and affects are actively centralised” (Harrington 2018, 28). Horror’s centering of the nonnormative in its fictional narratives provides an important space for queer spectators to experience catharsis, find connection, or feel seen since their nonnormative lives exist oppressed, judged, and unseen at the periphery of society. Noël Carroll writes “that what horrifies is that which lies outside cultural categories” (1987, 57; italics in the original), which Benshoff summarizes as being “in short, the queer” (1997, 26). To the cisheteropatriarchal norm, the queer is horrific and the representation of that horror in the filmic medium is often queer in return.

1.5 The (Horrific) Queer Uncanny

The queer connection to the horror genre can be better understood through recognition that the nascent, ontological nature of the film medium and the embodied experience of queerness are uncanny. In other words, the nature of queerness, in individuals and film, is uncanny. When Freud discussed the uncanny in 1919, he restated F. W. J. Schelling’s definition of the uncanny “as something which ought to have been kept concealed but which has nevertheless come to light” (13). This definition not only inadvertently confronts the historic queer experience of being expected to remain hidden in the shadows, but also simultaneously underscores the uncanny nature of queerness—queers are the uncanny (un)seen. Theorists such as Sue-Ellen Case (1991), Paulina Palmer (2012), and Nicholas Royle assert that the <sup>25</sup> Narrator Kaitlyn Stodola asserts that “the connection between queerness and horror is the sense of Other. . . . In my experience that connects to being queer, as you’re Other, you’re not mainstream. You’re this other thing that people are kind of afraid of—they don’t really know what to do with” (2020, 5).

---

“uncanny is queer. And the queer is uncanny” (Royle 2003, 43). As a survey participant indicates:

Most horror films have two motifs that queer folks identify with. The first is acts of transgression, the second is the unheimlich or the uncanny. Uncanny: that which is like us but not like us. This is something that a lot of queer people identify with due to feeling alienated from our own bodies or society (47181591).

Combined, the above establishment of the preternatural nature of queerness and the “queer nature of cinema itself as a medium” (Galt and Karl Schoonover, 90) denote how “cinema can be uncanny” (Hubner 2018, 50).

In 1896, Maxim Gorky, on first seeing a projection of the Lumière Cinématographe, famously wrote in a Russian newspaper of this new filmic experience: “It is terrifying to watch but it is the movement of shadows, mere shadows. Curses and ghosts, evil spirits that have cast whole cities into eternal sleep come to mind” (Gorky quoted in Skakov 2012, 220). Gorky’s deployment of the words “curses,” “ghosts,” and “evil spirits” illustrates the “uncanny” and haunting nature of cinema (Newton 2019, 17). In fact, through his filmic experience, Gorky believed “he had had an encounter with the undead” (Jones 2018, 44). And, in a way, he had; “there is something spectral about the experience of cinema,” and that “to enter the cinema is to cross a boundary, a threshold into the supernatural world” (Jones 2018, 45; italics in the original). The capture and projection of images and sound are a ghostly manifestation. Furthermore, since “all motion pictures become ghost stories” (Frayling 2013, 5), film can be understood to be the reanimated past haunting the present.<sup>26</sup> Film is a present-embodied experience of the past, with a spectator sometimes viewing dead actors brought back to life on the screen. The cinema experience is “a kind of semi-private séance” (Winter 1998, 138) and “a medium giving life and spirit to dead forms” (Hubner 2018, 45-46). In 1960, André Bazin spoke of film’s ontology as “change mummified” (1967, 15), further underscoring the queered uncanny nature of film, since change is active and unending, yet mummification speaks to the ossification of ghosts, in this case on screen. Therefore, the unsettling abnormality, or otherworldliness, of both the cinematic experience and queer individuals’ existence are a lurking reminder of possibilities beyond the enforced cisheterosexual norm. Film is simultaneously queer and uncanny, possessing a haunted quality that circuitously resonates with queer identity since “queerness can be understood in terms of haunting” (Boellstorff 2007, 185) and “being haunted and being a monster are queer narratives” (47121426).

---

<sup>26</sup> The cinema experience creates a liminal space between the audience and the projected image, images which are of “the past” and are captured in ghostly light and shadow, animating in and for the present through the medium of film, which itself queers time. Film is a victory over and a disruption of linear time through this ghostly and uncanny queer intrusion of the past in the present. This nonlinear victory speaks to a specifically queer temporality as evidenced in works by J. Halberstam (2005) and Elizabeth Freeman (2010). When Halberstam states that queer time emerges “once one leaves the temporal frames of bourgeois reproduction and family, longevity, risk/safety, and inheritance” (2005, 6), they speak to the queer potential to transgress and subvert cisheteronormativity and chrononormativity. This capitalist norm is, according to Freeman, “the use of time to organize individual human bodies toward maximum productivity” (2010, 3). Nonnormative queer temporalities are not structured by the cisheterosexual procreative linear cycle of birth, marriage, reproduction, and death. Just as film and queerness have disrupted the notions of linear time, hauntings act as a nonsequential form of time (Freeman 2010, xi).

1.6 Hauntology and Queer Identity

Explicating the intrinsic haunted nature of queerness generates a greater understanding of the queer connection to horror film. If film is a haunted medium, so, too, is queer embodiment. Queer, as both a term and an identity, is imbued with the painful ghosts of our collective traumatic past—a past that still haunts the present and future—which is, as Westengard states, “the trauma of being in a system built to invalidate and destroy anyone who strays from norm” (2019, 3). The experience of being queer, and even the formulation of queer theory, therefore, is imbued with ghosts, hauntings, possessions, and conjurings. So much so that Rommi Smith, in Imagining Queer Methods, declares that the “academic engaged in resurrecting repressed knowledge is like the medium: we speak to (and narrate) the ghost, the thing that is culturally, or intellectually, invisible” (2019, 214). Cisheteronormative society both renders queers as societal specters and leaves the queer person haunted. To comprehend the spectral queer identity that is beyond the visible social norm, queerness (from the past, present, and future) should be considered haunted and thus studied accordingly. One theoretical tool that can be utilized in order to see and understand the haunted nature of queerness is hauntology. Jacques Derrida’s concept of hauntology addresses a haunting which precedes ontology (1994, 10). Distilled down to its most comprehensible essence, hauntology is “a shorthand for the ways in which the past returns to haunt the present” (Coverley 2020, 7). Accordingly, hauntology will have always already haunted our understanding of the nature of queerness (as with film). Indeed, the “queer past that haunts queers in the present” is inextricable from queer embodiment (Muñoz 2009, 88). The haunted queer consequently experiences an asynchronistic temporality in which the past simultaneously haunts the present and future. This is one reason why queer potentiality within a cisheteronormative cultural ecology becomes rejected (Edelman 2004) or unrealized (Muñoz 2009), leaving the embodied queer in a state of liminal precarity. Queer liminal precarity is multiplicitous; the liminality is caused and perpetuated by cisheteronormative society, which grants queer acceptance conditionally based on homonormative assimilation (as when queer people adopt heteronormative institutions, such as marriage), with the rights or acceptance that cisheteronormative society decides to extend always already being threatened to be controlled or taken away at any moment. When a critical eye is focused on these liminal spaces, hauntology is a useful intrinsically queer theoretical lens, a tool and “a transgressive process” that “attempt[s] to articulate an ‘otherness’ that has effects in the present” (Connor 2017, 14-15). Hauntology, at its core, challenges binary oppositions, concentrating on the in-between spaces of the “past and the present, being and non-being, presence and absence” (Connor 2017, 15). Hauntology, then, offers queers a framework to embrace their ghostly state, an (in)visible and nonbinaristic liminal state of being. As cultural theorist Mark Fisher states: “Hauntology is the proper temporal mode for a history made up of gaps, erased names and sudden abductions” (2014, 130). This understanding of hauntology even applies to the omissions, eliminations, and removals of queers throughout history: queer history as specter—invisible, neglected, feared.

To be queer is to be haunted by not only the invisibility of our shared collective history, but also the dominance of cisheteronormativity. Queer theory “remains haunted by the political and transgressive charge of the early 1990s moment, and that this haunting orients it toward particular political and intellectual projects in the present” (Amin 2019, 286). The anger that underlies much of queer theory is its power, for queer theory emerged from queer activism spurred by pain, death, and rage. As Kadji Amin points out, queer “is a term sticky with history” (2019, 285). In fact, the term queer is haunted by its homophobic deployment as a longtime verbal weapon by “straight” people, as well as from its queer community reclamation during the AIDS crisis, one of the times when willful inaction from cisheteropatriarchal institutions killed many in a generation of queer men and trans women (Nadal 2020, 29). While joyous celebration is part of the queer community, there also exists a haunted undercurrent with a long history of invisibility, suppression, persecution, punishment, and death. Queer spectators comprehend, both consciously and unconsciously, the haunted nature that they represent and that they are drawn to see reflected back in their cinematic experiences with the horror genre.

1.7 Queer Theory, Queerness, and Queer Scholarship

Queer is a verb, an adjective, a noun, a pejorative, an identity, a sexual orientation, and a gender identity. And, like the horror genre itself, queer theory is a complex umbrella term that is difficult to define; queer theory is plural and fluid, not singular and static (Browne and Nash 2010, 7). Vitally, queer is not gender specific (Case 1991, 2), opening research to any and all queer embodiment. Queer, moreover, is not a biological designation but a sociopolitical definition that carries a spirit of solidarity. Yet, my employment of the umbrella term queer in this research is not to collapse and conflate the heterogeneous queer community into a single monolithic and marketable community; my aim is to create space for diversity within the queer community whilst simultaneously highlighting how these differences are formed in a nameable opposition to the cisheteronormative mainstream. Since “universalizing thinking can erase vulnerable queers, while minoritizing thinking can foreclose on connections and alliances” (Galt and Schoonover 2016, 77), I will analyze both the connections and salient differences of the aggregate data. Overall, my argument is that queer spectators have a distinctive relationship with horror, but individual intersectionality can definitely shift perspectives and experiences with horror fandom, narrative content, and access.<sup>27</sup> Furthermore, “queer is a term that can and should be redeployed, fucked with and used in resistant and transgressive ways” (Browne and Nash 2010, 9). When I use the term queer, I draw on the neglected power of all queers silenced before me, all those silenced now, and all those who will be silenced in the future. I draw on queer theory’s potential to destabilize the norms of time, space, society, and certainly academia.<sup>28</sup> Rosalind Galt's and Karl Schoonover's assertion in Queer Cinema in the World that "we are unwilling to relinquish the category of queer to charges that openness equals conceptual looseness and a dissipation of power" (2016, 14) is particularly empowering in this respect. In addition to Galt and Schoonover and the scholars featured in Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research (2010) and Imagining Queer Methods (2019), the works of Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick, Judith Butler, Jack Halberstam, and José Esteban Muñoz inform my analysis of identity formation outside of the cisheteronormative majority, as well as queer world-making and performance. In Queer Theory and Communication: From Disciplining Queers to Queering the Discipline(s), Yep, Lovaas, and Elia ask: "What does queer theory mean to scholars personally, theoretically, methodologically, and pedagogically?" (2003, 335-336). Personally, theoretically, methodologically, and pedagogically, queer theory liberates scholars from the academy's adherence to white cisheteropatriarchal norms. Importantly, this queer liberation is not to be confused with or equated to a lack of rigor; in fact, queer theory as liberator aids queer academics like myself to see beyond the normative, the standard, the status quo, all of which is a boon to academic research.

---

<sup>27</sup> Intersectionality dictates that one’s differing identity markers cannot be extracted from one another. For example, narrator Kim Thompson states that her “womanhood and Blackness always come hand in hand as identity markers” (2020, 7). In other words, Thompson’s experiences are always and inextricably as a Black woman.

Queer theory encourages paying attention to the embodied, living experiences of queer people. Browne and Nash refuse to clarify and define the terms queer and queering because they argue that to "clarify and define these terms is to limit their usage just to these understandings" (2010, 8). Categorization and definition is the work of the white cisheterosexual male colonizer that aims to limit existence into what he can understand and what he will legitimize. Instead of limiting, Browne and Nash opted for the scholars in the collection to adopt their own usage and definition of queer. Hence, my uses and definitions here follow this lead. Queer theory seeks to resist, reframe, recycle, negotiate, and subvert the cisheteronormative status quo. "A consciously cultivated multidisciplinary,” J. Halberstam asserts, “encourages queer scholars to use the methodologies that best match their projects rather than finding projects that allow them to use the discipline-appropriate methods” (2003, 363). This research project is, therefore, rooted in my own “scavenger methodology,” which incorporates differing methods in the research production process, and furthermore adopts Halberstam’s position that queer methodology “refuses the academic compulsion toward disciplinary coherence” (Halberstam 1998, 13). Apropos of the transdisciplinary nature of the horror genre, this research project situates an original data set from queer horror spectators in a critical framework at the nexus of horror studies, queer theory, cultural studies, film studies, reception studies, live cinema studies, ethnography, history, and social science. Therefore, following Andrew Scahill, this study’s textual promiscuity “will flirt with many bodies of theory but ultimately not be married to any of them. This critical nonmonogamy is useful in examining a figuration that touches so many areas, and this work will scavenge theoretically to provide a multidimensional portrait” (2015, 6). Decades ago, Judith Butler warned that “normalizing the queer would be, after all, its sad finish” (1994, 21). Built into the construct of queer theory being accepted as an academic tool is the paradox that, if it were ever to become academically institutionalized, queer theory would be rendered inefficacious. To maintain queer theory’s distinct function as the undisciplined discipline, scholars must resist “the institutional domestication of queer thinking” (Butler 1994, 21). One large threat to the progress of queer theory is the academy’s siloed university structure; to silo queer theory or studies into one department is to put it in a suffocating box, a coffin of sorts. In fact, as Halperin warns, “the more it verges on becoming a normative academic discipline, the less queer ‘queer theory’ can plausibly claim to be” (1997, 113). A part of the process of resisting normalization is resisting institutionalization; queer theory needs to continually question, push, radicalize, and look forward in order to remain queer. Looking forward also includes looking back to acknowledge the past, to respect and honor our elders; queer theory is deeply indebted to BIPOC feminist thinking including, but not limited to, the works of Gloria E. Anzaldúa, Audre Lorde, bell hooks, Patricia Hill Collins, Cherríe Moraga, Angela Davis, and Kimberlé Crenshaw. Moreover, queerness is infused into intersectional BIPOC feminist theory and work; indeed, the majority of the above-named women are queer. Given the aforementioned theorists’ intersectional embodiment in which race, sex, gender, sexuality, and class all exist in varying degrees of simultaneous oppression, there is little surprise that “to interrogate heteronormativity is to critique colonial power” (Galt and Schoonover 2016, 241; italics in the original). When I employ queer theory, I am invoking the multiple queer theories embodied in the singular, and, furthermore, signaling that queer theory exists as an amalgam of critical theory, art, and activism (Love 2019, 31).

---

<sup>28</sup> Halberstam offers insight into how academia can foster innovation in knowledge production by embracing failure and frivolity: "Being taken seriously means missing out on the chance to be frivolous, promiscuous, and irrelevant. The desire to be taken seriously is precisely what compels people to follow the tried and true paths of knowledge production around which I would like to map a few detours. Indeed terms like serious and rigorous tend to be code words, in academia as well as other contexts, for disciplinary correctness; they signal a form of training and learning that confirms what is already known according to approved methods of knowing, but they do not allow for visionary insights or flights of fancy" (2011, 6; italics in the original).

Whilst queer theory can seemingly appear complicated, amorphous, and elusive, at its foundation, queer theory is a simple and distinctive tool to continuously question cisheteronormativity since “queer worldmaking and livability require us to embrace multiplicity and pluralism, not binaries and dualisms” (Ghaziani and Brim 2019, 12). To be clear, queer theory does not vacillate in its definition; integral to the theory itself is a fluidity and transgression. Even while queer theory questions and challenges essentialist identity and binarism, I acknowledge that, by framing this study around queerness being both an identity and a methodological tool, I have thus constructed a binary between those who are queer and those who are not; however, even this binary is false dichotomy. While the focus of this research is on those who identify as queer, this study is purposefully not structured in opposition to those who are not. This research instead creates space for a heterogeneous population of queer people, one that shares a similarity in how we exist in opposition to the cisheteronormative world. Importantly, however, the focus remains fixated on the unique relationship that self-identified queers have with the horror genre, not on a sustained comparison or opposition to (or need to legitimize against) any cisheterosexual norms or populations, with the goal of adding to the small body of research that illustrates the “deep relevance of the horror film to queer audiences and queer scholars” (Miller 2011, 220-221).

I position this project as deliberately and decisively queer, as one that queers methodology to render visible a segment of the queer population that has a special relationship to horror film. Queerness—personally, ontologically, epistemologically, phenomenologically, methodologically, and theoretically—underpins every aspect of this study, and queer theory will function as a tool, an infused method, to root my thinking and challenge the dominance of cisheteronormativity in academia. “An essential component of queer methods,” argues David P. Rivera and Kevin L. Nadal, “is the centering of academia on the lived experiences of LGBTQ people” (2019, 192). To do just that, I center the voices of my survey participants and interview narrators as the core of this study. Moreover, in the tradition of numerous queer theorists (Stryker, Halberstam, Muñoz, Ahmed, et al.), I will be visible throughout. I am a horror-loving queer and that is inseparable from my research and central to its existence. Like other queers before me, I am unable to “remove my analysis from my own situation, my own attitudes towards and hopes for the genre, and this includes the act of (gendered, embodied) spectatorship” (Harrington 2018, 24). I identify as queer, gay, as a dyke, a lesbian and, while society polices, regulates, and objectifies my self and my body as being “woman,” I understand and represent myself to be post-binary and gender nonconforming. My declaration and visibility as a queer scholar here is important because of the “shortage of critical engagements with quantitative methods and methodologies by queer and sexualities researchers” (Browne 2010, 231). The self-reflective nature of this work functions as an act of excavation and reclamation for myself and the queer community. My own knowledge of horror and experiences being a horror-loving queer further function as “a legitimate data point in this research” (Robinson and Hunter 2019, 172). I came of age during the AIDS epidemic, losing both my father (d. 1983) and uncle (d. 1991) to AIDS, and I came into adulthood as an active participant in Queer Nation and AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP). For me, the personal is political; therefore, I invoke this phrase from the politics of disenfranchised experience not to uphold the fracturing outcomes of neoliberal identity politics, but instead to wield a tool for collective action, “for challenging illegitimate forms of power and dominance” (Heberle 2016, 594). Academic obfuscation contributes to the upholding of class distinctions and ossification of academic privilege; therefore, my conscious intention to make this study an accessible document should be understood as a queered political act. Since queer scholars “are subject to heightened scrutiny of their research topics, accusations of being biased in their work, and charges of an overall lack of academic rigor” (LaSala et al. in Rivera and Nadal 2019, 201), I not only challenge those practices but also make my queer subjective intentions and theoretical groundings explicitly clear.

This study offers interventions in queerness, horror, camp, and trauma, all of which evade a consensus on exact definitions—and are intricately interconnected. Similarly, I deliberately do not anchor this research to one traditional center; instead, this research experience consciously “has been rhizomic, anarchic, queer” (Heckert 2010, 48). As Deleuze and Guattari write, “any point of a rhizome can be connected to anything other, and must be” (2004, 7), which is illustrated by the connections between queerness, horror, camp, and trauma, all manifesting in multiple ways and multiple combinations. I remain committed to “nonlinear, open knowledges from the borders and margins” (Eversley and Hurson 2019, 252). For example, I value the expressions of theory from my narrators as much as I do those from established academics. I not only value the contributions of all my research participants, but also explicitly understand that “the citation is a political act” and bibliographies operate as political documents (Schottmiller 2018, 5). Particularly for marginalized communities, “academia has a long history of gatekeeping that prizes the doctoral degree as an essential qualification for inclusion in traditional academic circles” (Rivera and Nadal 2019, 199). While I am doing a culturalist reading that is grounded in queer theory, my research into queer spectators of horror film will also be theoretically and methodologically rooted in my embodied and active queerness—my nonnormative gender and sexuality.

1.8 Queer Scholars’ Impact on Horror Studies

As both the medium of film and the horror genre have intrinsically queer qualities, the development of horror studies, the academic discipline that investigates and theorizes horror, is indebted to queer scholars and theorists. Not coincidentally, film took quite some time to gain a foothold in the academy (while film was first publicly screened in 1895, film studies was not widely established until the 1960s) and the horror genre has been plagued historically by critical disapproval and disparagement. While there are multiple reasons for the slow acceptance of film studies, the primary reason distills down to the fact that “film was thought too trivial a subject to be taken seriously” (Chapman 2013, 2). Similarly, the “lowbrow” populist appeal of horror films often led critics to pan the genre. Correspondingly, the “horror genre itself” has “been treated like a second-class citizen” (Browning 2017, 97). Although academics and critics never cited a specific rationale for their beliefs, for keeping film and horror specifically at the margins of academic and critical respectability, one must question whether the intrinsic queerness of both film and horror could be an underlying reason why film and horror took so long to gain both critical and academic respect. Although tracing the development of cinema studies as an academic discipline is outside the purview of this research, focusing on the development of horror studies reveals the outsized contributions of queer academics to this discipline, starting with Robin Wood's "pioneering studies of the horror film" (Hubner 2018, 6).

The birth of horror studies can be traced back to 1979 when Wood, along with his partner Richard Lippe, organized "The American Nightmare," a special retrospective held at the Toronto International Film Festival (Wood 2018, vii). "The study of horror cinema," until this retrospective, was "a subject area that, until the 1970s and 1980s, made only sporadic appearances in film studies journals and other discourses" (Browning 2017, 97). From this horror film retrospective (which included screenings and interviews with prominent horror directors such as Wes Craven, John Carpenter, Brian De Palma, George A. Romero, Tobe Hooper, Stephanie Rothman, and David Cronenberg) came Robin Wood's essay "An Introduction to the American Horror Film," often credited with "jumpstarting" the discipline (Browning 2017, 97). Wood, an "out" gay man, even wore t-shirts that brandished gay rights messages on stage, a daring political move for the era (Wood 2002, xxix). If Wood gave the formation of the discipline its first jolt of electricity, queer scholars throughout the 80s and 90s furthered the field with groundbreaking works that continue to influence and shape discourse today. These queer scholars include Bonnie Zimmerman ("Daughters of Darkness: The Lesbian Vampire on Film" 1981), Barbara Creed ("Horror and the Monstrous-Feminine: An Imaginary Abjection" 1986), Richard Dyer ("Children of the Night: Vampirism as Homosexuality, Homosexuality as Vampirism" 1988), Rhona J. Berenstein ("Mommie Dearest: Aliens, Rosemary's Baby and Mothering" 1990), Sue-Ellen Case ("Tracking the Vampire" 1991), Ellis Hanson ("The Undead" 1991), Andrea Weiss ("Vampires and Violets: Lesbians in the Cinema" 1992), Terry Castle ("The Apparitional Lesbian" 1993), Susan Stryker ("My Words to Victor Frankenstein Above the Village of Chamounix: Performing Transgender Rage" 1993), J. Halberstam ("Skin Shows: Gothic Horror and the Technology of Monsters" 1995), Harry Benshoff ("Monsters in the Closet: Homosexuality and the Horror Film" 1997), and Patricia White ("Uninvited: Classical Hollywood Cinema and Lesbian Representability" 1999). All of them continue to be amongst the most cited academics in horror studies, indicating some measure of how difficult it is to overstate queer contributions to the development of the horror discipline. Even a cursory "horror studies" search online quickly yields Wood's "return of the repressed" and Creed's theory of the "monstrous-feminine." In fact, in myriad ways, the contributions of these queer academics functioned, and continue to function, as personal and political acts from our academic queer elders.

A direct link exists between the queer scholars whose work helped shape the discipline of horror studies and the work of the queer scholars continuing to shape the field today, including Linnie Blake, Andrew Scahill, Darren Elliott-Smith, Xavier Aldana Reyes, and Sam J. Miller. To clarify, this queer inheritance does not stipulate an intellectual consensus; this academic lineage speaks to a way of framing thoughts and arguments about the function of the horror genre, as well as how discourse is in a constant state of conversation with the past. Yet, conceivably and most importantly, all of the aforementioned foundational queer scholars deliberately and explicitly embed queerness into horror studies. While an in-depth discussion of every queer scholar's works that helped to galvanize horror studies as a respected discipline would distract focus, for not all those works directly relate to this study, it is important to indicate how this queered thinking influences mine. For example, work by Ellis Hanson, Richard Dyer, Terry Castle, and Patricia White indicates the impossibility of disentangling or extricating the personal from the political and the theoretical. Moreover, each teaches me that my queerness exists at the core of this research. My study contributes to this long tradition by placing queer spectators, often ignored or sidestepped, at the center of the horror experience.<sup>29</sup>

Robin Wood argued for the genre to be taken as a serious subject worthy of analysis, stating that horror was "the most important of all American genres and perhaps the most progressive, even in its overt nihilism" (2003, 76). Wood mixed Marx with Freud, and it would be difficult to overstate the influence of both Marxism and psychoanalysis in horror studies. Hence, the earliest contributions from queer scholars were steeped in Freudian and Lacanian psychoanalytic thought, as was vogue throughout the academy; in fact, this era was the "Golden Age of psychoanalytic film criticism" (Dumas 2014, 32). Wood's permanent ideological marks on the discipline are his focus on the figure of the monster, the Other, and on how “normality is threatened by the Monster” (2003, 133). While myriad scholars have employed Wood’s “return of the repressed” theory when analyzing horror, my use here will take it beyond textual analysis to embodied experience. My study is centered around the unique relationship that queers have with the horror genre and builds the argument that the horror genre is intrinsically queer. This declaration can, and arguably should, be understood as a societally repressed population returning to stake their claim on, instead of within, horror film.

---

<sup>29</sup> To accentuate this academic lineage, Darren Elliott-Smith in Queer Horror Film and Television: Sexuality and Masculinity at the Margins, states: "Scholars including Robin Wood, Carol J. Clover, Richard Dyer, Ellis Hanson, Judith Halberstam and Harry Benshoff have covered significant ground in their respective analyses of homosexuality in the history of the horror genre" (2016, 1).

The act of acknowledging and naming the contributions of queer scholars to the development of horror studies is a political act. When cisheterosexual academics analyze horror films, they unwittingly privilege cisheterosexual experiences, thereby inadvertently excluding or bypassing queer ones. One salient example is Carol J. Clover’s work on the slasher subgenre and its “final girl” because of the groundbreaking and enduring impact this work has had on the field.<sup>30</sup> In her book Men, Women, and Chain Saws: Gender in the Modern Horror Film (1992), Clover theorizes the final girl and represents the audience as being predominantly adolescent and heterosexual male, both for the slasher film in particular and the horror genre in general.<sup>31</sup> In her theorization of the final girl, Clover roots the concept in fixed and binaristic gender norms, which explains the presumed cisheterosexual male spectator’s cross-gender identification with the film’s heroine. What Clover’s “account leaves out,” Halberstam notes, however, “are the powerful potential identifications to be made between queer female viewers and the queer monster killer final girl” (2012, 341). Building on Halberstam’s point, Darren

---

<sup>30</sup> The 1992 publication date of Men, Women, and Chain Saws places Clover’s work in the same cultural timeframe during which queer scholars were galvanizing queer theory into an academic discipline. Thus, Clover’s analysis of the slasher film at that time would not have had the ability to build on or benefit from a large body of established queer theory, even though queer scholars working at the same time as Clover were infusing their horror analysis with queer thought (see Zimmerman, Creed, Dyer, Berenstein, Case, Hanson, Weiss, Castle, Stryker, etc.). This theoretical difference underscores the entanglement of intellectual output and intersectional embodiment. Clover’s lack of engagement with the queer spectator becomes pronounced, however, in the new preface of the 2015 updated edition, where Clover neglects to reckon with queer theoretical advancements since her original publication to examine how the queer spectator complicates her original analysis of the slasher film.

<sup>31</sup> Clover explicitly states that her analytical interest lies predominantly “in the male viewer’s stake in horror spectatorship” (1992, 7) because, in part, within horror audiences “the preponderance of young males appears constant” (6) and in particular because the slasher’s “majority audience, perhaps even more than the audience for horror in general, was largely young and largely male” (23).

Elliott-Smith emphasizes the importance of queer considerations for slasher films, being that the “heterosexual assumption placed upon the horror spectator limits the possibility of the gay male spectator identifying with the female Final Girl figure in a non-heterosexual way” (2016, 28). Clover’s declaration that “young males are also, I shall suggest, the slasher film’s implied audience, the object of its address” (1992, 23) was a long-standing premise in early horror scholarship. However, in my survey of over four thousand queer individuals, the slasher film ranks as a top ten favorite subgenre across all gender identities surveyed (see Chapter 3).<sup>32</sup> In other words, queer people are ardent slasher film spectators and queer men do not dominate the queer fanbase of slasher films. This finding does, then, validate Clover’s declaration that “horror is a marginal genre that appeals to marginal people” (1992, 231), even if she does not directly name queer people as being part of that marginal group. The popularity of the slasher film with a range of queer spectators, despite previous cisheteronormative assumptions, underscores the obligation for horror scholars to actively consider the queer spectator, for the white cisheteropatriarchy has been allowed to be singularly assumed and unchallenged for too long. Conversely, since queer scholars experience a nonnormative reality, they inevitably and importantly challenge the heteronormative binaristic paradigms and, thus, further scholarship. For example, Rhona J. Berenstein, in Attack of the Leading Ladies: Gender, Sexuality, and Spectatorship in Classic Horror Cinema, disputes Clover’s model of the masochistic female spectator and discusses how Clover actively bypasses the analysis of women viewers altogether (1996, 36). Berenstein, furthermore, not only challenges the presumptive idea that classic Hollywood horror film narratives center heterosexual desire, but also rejects typical masculine/feminine, sadistic/masochistic, spectator/spectacle gendered binaries (1996). In doing so, Berenstein creates academic space in the field of horror for nonnormative desires, sexualities, and identities. Berenstein herself explicitly states: “As a lesbian film scholar and spectator living in a late twentieth-century culture in which heterosexuality is the norm, I delight in classic horror’s transgressions of sexual difference and gender traits” (1996, 37). This quote underscores the importance of Berenstein’s identity to her work, intimates how her queerness is essential to her research and findings, and informs this study’s praxis.

---

<sup>32</sup> While queer horror spectators across the gender spectrum love slashers films, outside the queer community, slasher films are likely watched predominantly by men (particularly in consideration of Brigid Cherry’s findings that women dislike slasher films, with only 25 percent of her survey participants liking all or most slashers, p. 88). My survey data thus demonstrates a difference in slasher film enjoyment between queer and cisheterosexual horror spectators.

Berenstein also was the first scholar to excavate and reanimate the female horror spectator from historical sources. Working within a focus on Hollywood horror films between 1931-1936, Berenstein used archival research to (re)insert the female spectator into horror’s audience, whilst simultaneously challenging James B. Twitchell’s sadistic male/passive female binaristic spectatorship model (Berenstein 1996, 36). Berenstein writes that classic horror “figures gender as a malleable feature of identity, as well as a stable role. To see it otherwise is to impose a familiar, but reductive, model of gender and genre relations” (1996, 203). Echoing Berenstein, this study positions queerness as both a fluid state and a stable identity—queer spectators cannot remove their queerness, yet that queerness does not exist in a fixed state. While Berenstein’s concept of “spectatorship-as-drag” releases gender roles to be more fluid, acknowledging that horror audiences temporarily “wear their spectatorship as a costume that offers temporary release from everyday identities,” her concept does not account for those whose identity is given release through horror film consumption (1996, 204). While my survey results reveal that queer horror spectators do find temporary release through horror film consumption, there is no indication that this release is predicated on donning an ideological spectatorial costume that cloaks queerness. In fact, a spectator’s queerness is not only inseparable but intrinsic to their relationship to the horror genre. Over 57 percent of survey participants report that they have a different reaction to horror films as compared with heterosexual spectators (see Chapter 3). While Berenstein focuses on spectatorial gender identity, Rob Latham instead asks, “what if the spectatorial system is a contingent historical artifact rather than an essential psychic structure?” (1998, 88). Here Latham’s binarist thinking overlooks how spectatorship is simultaneously rooted in film as a cultural historical artifact and a psychic function. A horror spectator’s engagement with horror films is historically and sociologically contingent upon multiple factors, such as release dates, developments within the genres, and modes of viewing (theatre, TV, streaming, and so on), with the viewer’s queerness also being essential and inextricable to their viewing experience and how they decode that artifact.

The aforementioned landmark books by Creed and Berenstein functioned to belatedly incorporate women, gender, and queerness into horror studies. In 1993, Creed was able to “justifiably complain about the dearth of previously published scholarship on the role of women in the horror genre,” underscoring the lack of attention paid to the role of women in horror both on screen and as spectators (Dumas 2014, 39). Creed’s scholarship expanded the function of women in horror, raising them from passive victim to active monster (1993). And since that insertion of women into horror studies, “gender has been one of the most important and productive areas of debate in Horror Studies” (Aldana Reyes 2019, 30). By the late 1990s, books began to be solely focused on homosexuality and horror. However, even though Patricia White, in one such text Uninvited: Classical Hollywood Cinema and Lesbian Representability (1999), analyzes gothic horror films such as Rebecca (1940), Curse of the Cat People (1944), The Uninvited (1944), The Innocents (1961), and The Haunting (1963), she only speaks about a theoretical lesbian spectator.<sup>33</sup> While the contributions of these queer scholars stepped horror studies in new queer directions, a larger push came in 1997 when Harry M. Benshoff, a queer academic, theoretically argued the direct connection between the queer spectator and the horror genre.

1.9 Centering Queers and Queerness in Horror Studies

Thus far, I have succinctly covered the contributions that certain queer scholars have made to the development of horror studies, and now turn to one queer scholar’s canonical work that centers its discourse on the intersection of queerness and horror: Harry M. Benshoff’s Monsters in the Closet: Homosexuality and the Horror Film. First published in 1997, Benshoff’s book brought the queer monster out of the closet, “showing convincingly that one can produce a thorough history of horror cinema by focusing on its ‘queer’ moments” (Latham 1998, 100). Specifically, and most pertinently, Benshoff argues that “the figure of the monster throughout the history of the English-language horror film can in some way be understood as a metaphoric construct standing in for the figure of the homosexual” (1997, 4). Benshoff, with great detail, delineates how this “monster queer” functions to oppress queer people whilst simultaneously

---

<sup>33</sup> Moreover, White’s reading of the theoretical lesbian spectator is steeped in now-outdated Freudian ideas.

acting as a beacon for queer spectators, specifying that queer viewers are “more likely than straight ones to experience the monster’s plight in more personal, individualized terms” (1997, 13). My survey participants support Benschhoff’s allegorical reading of the monster as homosexual, with 73.3 percent identifying with either the monster, the victim, or both (see Chapter 3). Building on Benschhoff’s metaphorical “monster queer,” Sam J. Miller, in “Assimilation and the Queer Monster,” argues that the post 9/11 political and cultural of assimilation of the queer community has all but killed the queer monster (2011, 220-233). Miller states that the “death of the queer monster provides an analogy for the normalization of queer identity” (2011, 222). Even though queers have gained increased societal acceptance, as Miller notes, queer identity is far from normalized and, in fact, as will be discussed, queer subjectivity exists in a state of precarious liminality.<sup>34</sup>

As an empirical research project, this study is less concerned with the symbolic and allegorical construct of the queer monster and more interested in how queer spectators identify with the central figures in horror films—both the monster and the victim—supplementing the theory of Benschhoff and Miller with the evidenced experiential. This study, therefore, investigates and provides data on “how actual practices of spectatorship interact with the narrative patterns of a genre system,” which Benschhoff urges “must then be considered when discussing the queer pleasures of a horror film text itself” (1997, 11). Benschhoff sets out four distinct paths for a film to be queer: textual, extratextual, subtextual, and “queer spectator’s ‘gay-dar’” (1997, 13-15). That queer gaze is most applicable to this research. Benschhoff argues, as Vito Russo and Alexander Doty did before him, that a queer audience member can queer a text through a queer reading, a method that “crucially unhitches queer film from intentionality” (Galt and Schoonover 2016, 169). Whilst explicit queerness, coded queerness,

---

<sup>34</sup> The global LGBTQ+ population continues to face societal repression and criminalization, legislative discrimination, and physical violence. As of December 2020, the International Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Trans and Intersex Association reports that “69 UN member States still criminalise consensual same-sex sexual acts between adults” (Paletta 2020, n.p.). In countries with some LGBTQ+ protections, such as the US, the Human Rights Campaign (HRC) reports that “the FBI’s hate crime statistics from 2016 to 2019—the most recent statistics available—show an increase from 1,076 to 1,195 hate crime incidents targeted on the basis of sexual orientation” (Blanchet 2021, n.p.). Further, on March 13, 2021, the HRC reported that “legislation filed this week mark the 80th, 81st, and 82nd anti-transgender bill introduced in the 2021 state legislative session, surpassing the 2020 total of 79 and marking the highest number of anti-transgender bills in history” (Ronan 2021, n.p.). A couple of days later, the Vatican decreed that same-sex unions cannot be blessed because God “does not and cannot bless sin” (Holy See Press Office, March 15, 2021, n.p.).

and the queerness of the filmmakers matter, the queer gaze ultimately sets its sights beyond the singular film; a queer person views a film and then “forge[s] deep emotional connections with horror” (Scales 2015) as an entire genre, ingesting it whole.

The twenty-first century’s queer horror scholars, advancing and expanding the works of our queer academic elders, are centering queerness and the queer experience in horror studies; however, even still these works remain focused on the queer male experience. For instance, the primary focus of Darren Elliott-Smith’s Queer Horror Film and Television: Sexuality and Masculinity at the Margins, “rests on representation of masculinity and gay male spectatorship in queer horror films and television post-2000” (2016, 2; italics in the original). Elliott-Smith shifts the focus from the queer monster as a threat to heteronormativity to “the anxieties within gay subcultures” (2016, 3; italics in the original). Similarly, Adam Scales expands beyond the representational to examine the reading receptions and online subjectivity of queer horror fans in “Logging into Horror’s Closet: Gay Fans, the Horror Film and Online Culture;” however, he too focuses narrowly on gay cis men. Even still, the queer horror spectator study I conducted for this research affirms Scales’ argument that “gay fans hold vastly different investments in and emotional connections to horror” (2015, 242). And while Scales argues that gay male horror fans want “to ‘out’ what they perceive to be ‘closeted’ horror texts” (2015, 24), I argue that queer horror fans overall have less concern with “outing” specific texts and greater interest in claiming the entire horror genre as queer. Overall, this study and research creates a more complete understanding of the queer experience with and through the horror genre, changing “the significant lack of empirical research on horror’s audiences” (Scales 2015, 20). This work also encompasses the vast queer spectrum of sexual orientation and gender identity<sup>35</sup> as this study emphatically declares that queerness exists in horror not only representationally but also ontologically and phenomenologically.

In a 2019 introduction to the journal Horror Studies, Mark Jancovich “was struck both by how much has changed in horror scholarship since the late 1980s and, depressingly, by how little has changed” (2019, 3). From Freud to Lacan and Kristeva to Creed, Freudian psychoanalysis has long held sway over horror studies.<sup>36</sup> Even in the twenty-first century, psychoanalysis still held such an influential hold over the discipline that Reynold Humphries chastised Steven Shaviro's "silly and counterproductive injunction to 'avoid Freud'" (2002, 168).<sup>37</sup> In usage, psychoanalytic readings center the film text and do not take "into account the film's impact on audience" (Fischer and Landy 1987, 62).<sup>38</sup> In fact, because horror studies has spent so much time looking to "Freud and his heirs," some scholars such as Jonathan Lake Crane actively work against "the unconscious unilaterally determin[ing] the meaning of terror" (1994, vi). In other words, there must be more to terror than the universally applied psychoanalytic theories of repression, libidinal urges, phallic and castration obsession, and other psychic disturbances, all of which render the spectator a passive or unnecessary subject. This study moves beyond such psychoanalytic paradigms by privileging embodied experiences, rather than by centering on unconscious biases or unreachable psychosexual drives. The slow theoretical shift away from Freudian and Lacanian psychoanalytic theories of spectatorship began to invigorate methodological investigations, starting with the hypothetical active spectator. This research actively disengages from Freudian psychoanalytic theory not only because his "work on homosexuality is peppered with misogyny and homophobia" (Westengard, 37), but also due to the fact that the theoretical framework "has crumbled under more than a century of scientific scrutiny, which has falsified or failed to find evidence for the psychological mechanisms and processes that Freud posited" (Clasen 2017, 3). Furthermore, this study does not engage with disembodied theories like psychoanalysis (the authority of the cisheteropatriarchy that dictates what something means), but with embodied experiences and queered meaning-making (meaning determined by distinct nonnormative individuals for themselves). This work fluidly engages with a transdisciplinary queered theoretical framework, in part driven by the fact that, in <sup>36</sup> Psychoanalysis, especially as used to analyze horror, is primarily focused on sexuality and gender; however, these psychoanalytical models of sexuality and gender have always privileged cisgender male heterosexuality because that is Freud's normative model (thereby Other-ing women and queers).

---

<sup>35</sup> Both sexual orientation and gender identity exist on a spectrum, a continuum with variance and flexibility far beyond the binarism of homosexuality and heterosexuality. Chapter 3 presents data about the sexual orientations and gender identities of this study’s survey participants.

---

<sup>37</sup> Steven Shaviro, in The Cinematic Body writes: "Today, the most crucial task for any theory of sexuality remains how to get away from Freud. We are tired of endless discussions of the phallus, the castration complex, and the problematics of sexual representation. Psychoanalytic discourse, even at its ostensibly most critical, does nothing but reinscribe a universal history of lack and oppression. We cannot really oppose the dominant male-heterosexual order when our only language is the code that defines and ratifies precisely that order. We cannot move toward new articulations of bodies and pleasures so long as we think the body only through the defiles of language, signification, and representation" (1993, 66).

<sup>38</sup> Further, empirical evidence is lacking in support of psychoanalytic approaches to horror.

aggregate, the theoretical and methodological developments—from the abject to affect and from psychoanalysis to neurocinematics—in horror studies over the past 40 years were born from a wide range of analytical perspectives and frameworks, including cultural (Blake 2008), historical (Dixon 2010), philosophical (Carroll 1990), sociological (Clover 1992), psychological (Creed 1993), physiological (Aldana Reyes 2016), biological (Morgan 2002), and phenomenological (Hanich 2018). With the ever-increasing institutionalization of horror studies in the academy, it remains pertinent to remember that this discipline was forged from the work of scholars who crossed academic departments and came from various disciplines to engage with the horror genre, which should compel contemporary scholars to continue to approach the genre from a similarly fluid, transdisciplinary queered position. As scholars engage across various disciplines, key shared frameworks and methods are still foundational. For example, film, regardless of genre, is a cultural project that should not be removed from its historicized sociopolitical contexts. However, horror is a genre designed to elicit a bio-physiological response; thus, horror studies needs to continue to embrace bio-psychological and quantitative investigations to specifically understand responses to the unique genre. Even still, any focus on horror through biological and clinical psychology lenses should not come at the cost of theoretical perspectives that lie outside the bio-psychological. Since horror shares an epistemological, transgressive core with queer theory, it is no surprise that numerous queer theorists have seamlessly engaged with horror. In fact, Westengard argues “that queer theory is itself expressly [G]othic” (2019, 63; italics in the original), further illustrating the inextricable connection between the queer, the Gothic, and horror film.<sup>39</sup>

Evidencing this interconnectivity, the work that follows examines the unique relationship that queer spectators have with the horror genre, using queer theory as my main tool of intellectual inquiry. Simply stated, if horror studies is the “what” of my investigation, queer theory informs my analytical “how.” While I previously situated myself within a queer theory framework, I need to be explicit that this queer framework also exists throughout my work here. Queer theory is the theoretical, ontological, epistemological, phenomenological, and methodological scaffolding from which this work will frame itself. Examining the queer is crucial to understanding horror; as Halberstam states: “Homosexuality haunts the [G]othic in all of its manifestations” (2000, 340). This is equally true of horror, as this study demonstrates. Hence, the homosexual haunts horror in all of its manifestations. Horror film was born from gothic literature, with both being capable of functioning as tools of transgression.<sup>40</sup> Taking this further, the homosexual haunts more than merely the horror genre, for, as Ken Gelder states, “the figure of the homosexual ‘haunts’ heterosexuality. The latter earnestly goes about exorcising the former from its domain, even though the achievement of its self-definition depends upon the homosexual’s unceasing presence” (2000, 187). Heterosexuality needs homosexuality to exist, whereby the cisheteropatriarchy frames the queer as the monstrous Other in order to preserve the heterosexual as the “natural” center of society. George E. Haggerty, in fact, theorizes how the Gothic and the queer actually operate similarly in terms of undermining consensual epistemologies, explicitly stating that we can understand gothic affect as a queer mode. Laura Westengard emphasizes this point when she asserts, as with queer theory, that “queer culture is [G]othic at its core” (2019, 191). Haggerty states, “a wide range of writers, dispersed historically and culturally, use ‘[G]othic’ to evoke a queer world that attempts to transgress the binaries of sexual decorum” (2006, 2). With this evocation, Haggerty directly addresses how affect, the objective of both the gothic mode and the horror genre, is deployed to elicit a reader/spectator response to queer transgression.

---

<sup>39</sup> Gothic is an affective and aesthetic mode that investigates fear and is, therefore, virtually synonymous with horror for the purposes of this study. This difference is developed later in this chapter.

The intertwined connection between the Gothic and horror has existed ever since the horror genre was developed through gothic fiction. As Aldana Reyes argues “the collapse of Gothic and horror, or vice versa, is understandable: both the horror genre and [g]othic aesthetics are invested in darkness and in negative affect” (2020, 7). While not all Gothic is horror, nor is <sup>40</sup> Both gothic literature and horror film have a long history of being politically, allegorically, and ideologically reactionary. Horror films, as with all cultural artifacts, can be progressive or reactionary, depending on ideological intentions (regardless if those intentions are conscious or subconscious). Progressive horror films are those films that challenge or subvert the normative status quo, whereas reactionary (or conservative) horror creates narratives that function to uphold the normative status quo. Early on Robin Wood “stressed the genre’s progressive or radical elements, its potential for the subversion of bourgeois patriarchal norms, it is obvious enough that this potential is never free from ambiguity. The genre carries within itself the capability of reactionary inflection, and perhaps no horror film is entirely immune from its operations. It need not surprise us that there is a powerful reactionary tradition to be acknowledged—so powerful that it may at times appear the dominant one” (Wood 1984, 191-192).

---

all horror Gothic, both Gothic and horror ontologically share a transgressive, nonnormative, affective core—a distinction and relationship that warrants further explication and analysis here. This study emphasizes and employs the shared affective nature of both gothic mode and horror genre, thereby deploying and incorporating theories that detail gothic affect to examine horror film affect and its queer spectatorship. To this end, Westengard traces “the unspeakability of [Gothic’s] affective register” and outlines how gothic aesthetics function to create an “experience of heightened and disorganized emotion” (2019, 7).<sup>41</sup> Given that both the gothic mode and horror genre are fundamentally affective, then gothic affect (in its terminology, sentiment, and employment) should be understood as a primogenitor to horror film affect. Both primarily and primally trigger emotional and physical reactions to possess their readers and spectators. While “the Gothic and horror remain strange, associative bedfellows” (Aldana Reyes 2020, 8), the Gothic, as an aesthetic and affective mode that investigates terror and fear, is employed to be and should be understood as synonymous with horror for the purposes of this study. This framework specifically engages gothic theory that elucidates the mode’s affective nature—both aesthetically and representationally—since this study exists at the nexus of that affect and its queer reception. Indeed, the mode of both the Gothic and horror is “most effective when it is most affective” (Clemens 1999, 1).

Queer theorists have influenced horror studies and horror has influenced queer theory, even if to a lesser degree.<sup>42</sup> To recapitulate, even though queer scholars were instrumental to the establishment of horror studies as a discipline, few queer theorists actively engage with horror studies. To date, when queer academics have engaged with queer spectators of the horror genre, the focus has been almost exclusively on gay men. Heretofore, both horror studies and queer theory have neglected to interact with the full spectrum and reality of queer horror spectators—which, considering the transgressive nature of horror and queerness, appears to be a willful decision and or glaring oversight that results in an erasure. This project presents itself as a timely and critically significant corrective by actively working to amplify the voices of a diverse range of queer horror fans, based on embodied research and through their lived experiences. “Audience research is hard, in many ways. Not doing it, however,” as Martin Barker states “is becoming inexcusable” (2013, 115; italics in the original). Stated differently, I worked “in a theoretically engaged way by grounding analysis in materiality, lived experience and empirical research” (Rooke 2010, 26). My focus is not the deconstruction and analysis of the object of the fandom (the horror film), but the subjective experiences and meaning making of the spectators (audience/fans) themselves. As Matt Hills states: “Audience studies focuses on what texts mean for their viewers/fans” (2014, 91; italics in the original). If horror studies represents what I am thinking about and queer theory is the tool that frames how I think, empirical audience studies makes visible about whom I am thinking: horror-loving queers.

---

<sup>41</sup> Westengard’s work elaborates on the work of George Haggerty, Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick, and Maggie Kilgour.

<sup>42</sup> In fact, queer theory is haunted by gothic horror tropes, as Westengard has argued in Gothic Queer Culture, demonstrating that gothicism is woven into the fabric of queer theory from the 1990s until today (2019).

1.10 Inclusively Queer Methodological Approaches

Bruce A. Austin, echoing Roland Barthes’s restoration of the reader, writes: “The message and its meaning are not synonymous; the meaning of a film is created by those who view it. What the meaning is and how it is created, therefore, fall within the purview of audience research” (1989, x). Direct engagement of horror audiences is the only route that allows researchers to understand the meaning of the horror genre to queer individuals. Therefore, the distinctive relationship that queer spectators have with the horror genre will be elucidated through both quantitative and qualitative research methods. For the purposes of this study, I designed and created an original data set devoted to the queer horror spectator that goes well beyond the assumed genre audience—young, heterosexual males (see Handel 1955; Twitchell 1985; Derry 1987; Clover 1992; Kramer 1998, et al.) and that aims very specifically to gauge the relationship queer spectators have with horror film. While a small number of scholars have analyzed women spectators and the horror film (Williams 1991; Clover 1992; Creed 1993; Berenstein 1996; Cherry 1999; Vosper 2013, et al.), the vast majority of horror spectator scholarship remains focused on the young, heterosexual male viewer, perpetuating an assumed dominate viewer and a binary division across gender and sexual orientation. Further, when scholars discuss the intersection of homosexuality and horror film (Benshoff 1997; Skal 2001; Scales 2015; Elliott-Smith 2016, et al.), the focus is most often textual analysis centered primarily on gay cis men. Scholarship has also largely dismissed women from being considered horror enthusiasts, with lesbians predominantly discussed in the context of vampire films (Zimmerman 1981; Case 1991; Weiss 1992; Auerbach 1995). Even more, analysis about trans*,<sup>43</sup> nonbinary, asexual, and other queer identities is scant. Consequently, the full spectrum of the diverse, engaged, and creative horror audience and fanbase has not been entirely visible or understood. This study remedies that by staging an inclusive empirical intervention, thereby becoming both the largest horror study and most inclusive queer horror study to date.

In 1996, James B. Weaver and Ron Tamborini edited Horror Films: Current Research on Audience Preferences and Reactions as a way to “put the study of audience responses to frightening fiction on the map as a significant research venture” (1996, ix). Yet, nearly a quarter of a century later, this volume remains the only organized effort to bring together distinct empirical studies on horror audiences into one collection, even as the scholarship included does not directly address queer audiences. Brigid Cherry, in “The Female Horror Film Audience: Viewing Pleasures and Fan Practices” (1999), concludes not only that female horror fans “refuse to refuse to look” (2002, 169), but also that “female viewers of the horror film do not adopt purely masculine viewing positions” (2002, 176). While I incorporate Cherry’s empirical research techniques by using data primarily collected from both questionnaires and in-depth interviews that are quantitatively and qualitatively analyzed, my research has been able to expand upon Cherry’s methods by utilizing online engagement tools, which helped me massively increase my n number (my usable sample size, which is 4,107 survey participants) from Cherry’s. In the conclusion to “Questioning Queer Audiences: Exploring Diversity in Lesbian and Gay Men’s Media Uses and Readings” (2012), Alexander Dhoest and Nele Simons challenge the application of queer theory’s more radical notions to the entire LGBTQ+ community, arguing that the general queer masses do not actualize those extremes. In fact, they explicitly state that their findings “strongly support the necessity to further explore the claims of queer theory in empirical research” (Dhoest and Simons 2012, 274). Based on data from my empirically engaged queer spectators, I challenge Dhoest and Simons’ findings that “most respondents sounded anything but queer in their approach to representations” and that “none commented on the heterocentrism that is such a central issue in academic criticism” (2012, 273). In other words, Dhoest and Simons state that their research indicates that most queers do not center their queerness in their media uses and readings. In direct opposition to that claim, my empirical research clearly illustrates that the majority of queer horror spectators center queerness in their relationship to horror. As examples, these direct quotes from anonymous survey participants emphasize their queerness and/or comment on being queer in a straight world:

---

<sup>43</sup> I employ the term trans* throughout this study as an inclusive definition and umbrella term that includes a range of nonconforming gender subjectivities. As Jack Halberstam explains, “the asterisk modifies the meaning of transitivity by refusing to situate transition in relation to a destination, a final form, a specific shape, or an established configuration of desire and identity. The asterisk holds off the certainty of diagnosis; it keeps at bay any sense of knowing in advance what the meaning of this or that gender variant form may be, and perhaps most importantly, it makes trans* people the authors of their own identity” (2018, 4).

I have way less tolerance for heterosexual tropes and cliches. And I prefer camp and intelligence out of horror films, whereas I think the average viewer is happy with lazy films that perpetuate their heteronormative reality (46764770).

I feel differently from heterosexual people about MOST things, and horror as a genre is no different. I think that het folks may not read queer subtext or nuance into things the way that I do, and that het folks react differently than queer viewers do to themes such as rape, possession, impregnation, brain-washing, torture, home invasion, and body horror—all of which can hit much closer to home (47119978).

My being queer influences my tastes in everything. However, beyond this overarching influence, I feel myself often drawn to horror films that disrupt heterosexual relationships, family units, or romances. Because of this, I am often drawn to horror that contains a physical monstrous presence, though ghosts and incorporeal demons might also serve to disrupt normative behavioral models. I especially like horror films that do not have a clean resolution, where the norm cannot be returned to, often because patriarchal, heterosexual, cisgendered norms have caused the calamity in some way in the first place, and a return to these norms really just represents another moment of terror and disquiet (47725637).

My favorite thing about horror is it’s disruption of heteronormativity. Whereas I think straight people sometimes thrill in the scare of that threat, I rarely identify with the “normal” characters and revel in their plight (47112178).

When what is threatened is a sort of heteronormative way of life or society, I’ll tend to side with the monster (47716725).

I feel LGBTQ people are constantly having to adjust themselves to navigate around heterosexual society so it's easier for us to enjoy horror as we are in scary situations and live in a type of fear daily that heterosexuals don't have to deal with (48766870).

The survey participants explicitly comment, as well, on the horror genre's representational heterocentrism, with 62.4 percent strongly agreeing or agreeing that "there is too much heterosexual sex in horror films."<sup>44</sup> This and additional mixed-method data from queer survey participants and narrators emphasize that their queerness is centered in not only their media uses and readings, but also their identities.

Historically, horror studies has barely engaged horror audiences and, moreover, the majority of the few studies that have been conducted did not directly engage queer audiences. As prime example of that exclusion, Zillmann and Weaver's Horror Films, the only empirical collection about horror to date (and now dated itself), ignores the potentialities and possibilities of queer audiences. Instead, the collected empirical studies featured in Horror Films reach conclusions such as this: horror "provide[s] a forum, akin to rites of passage, for male and female adolescents to practice and demonstrate mastery of societally defined gender-specific expressive displays" (Zillmann and Weaver 1996, 83). Zillmann and Weaver further report that male enjoyment of a horror film nearly doubles when accompanied by a female peer who displays acute distress as compared with a female peer who does not display fear, and that "female respondents enjoyed horror the least in the presence of a fearful, distressed male" (1996, 93). This perpetuates an extreme heteronormative binaristic sociopolitical structure. Similarly, in another study, Zillmann and Gibson state that male enjoyment of horror is predicated on mastering any form of distress and, conversely, that female enjoyment is predicated on displaying distress; this underscores a "gender-specific socialization of fear and its mastery" (1996, 25). Yet another chapter finds that "watching horror films is said to offer viewers a socially sanctioned opportunity to perform behaviors consistent with the traditional gender stereotypes" (Tamborini and Salomonson 1996, 184). Furthermore, Tamborini and Salomonson, in their study, discuss how "modern cultural norms provide males with few situations where they can practice fear mastery behaviors, and females have few occasions to display distress or to seek male protection apart from viewing graphic horror presentations” (1996, 184). Quite simply, the research featured in Horror Films does not seek, and consequently the findings leave no room for, the experiences of nonnormative genders, sexualities, and relationships. While Zillmann and Weaver point out that the “all-inclusiveness” of their findings are “certainly open to challenge” because of the existence of “meek and mild-mannered boys and tough tomboys,” this disclaimer hardly constitutes a theoretical reckoning with the queer spectrum and, additionally, is based in coded stereotypes (1996, 98). Moreover, Zillmann and Weaver, reporting R. H. Weiss’s (1990) findings that were based on a study of fourteen- and fifteen-year-old teens, write that there is “no doubt that females respond unfavorably to horror” (1996, 89). In contrast to that finding, while my survey participants all were over the age of eighteen, over 56 percent of my cisgender women survey participants report that they were under 12 when they first started watching horror films and 89 percent were 17-and-under when they first started watching horror films, indicating that Weiss’s findings likely excluded queer teenage women.<sup>45</sup> In summary, to date, the only empirical collection focused exclusively on horror, Horror Films, renders the queer horror spectator invisible and presents evidentiary data in conflict with my current data and findings, speaking to glaring omissions and a resounding need for future empirical research to always include the full spectrum of genders and sexualities, which will be presented in Chapter 3.

---

<sup>44</sup> Whereas, only 10 percent "strongly disagree" or "disagree" with this same statement; the remaining 28.6 percent "neither agree or disagree" or "don't know."

While the collected scholars in Horror Films ignore the queer spectator, the scholars featured in Making Sense of Cinema: Empirical Studies into Film Spectators and Spectatorship (2016) largely ignore the horror film in their important contribution to film studies: empirically investigating film audiences.

---

<sup>45</sup> This assertion can be made because statistical extrapolation of this study’s data indicates that young queer women were not a part of R. H. Weiss’s original study. Evidenced with 99 percent confidence, 58.5 percent to 65.5 percent of all queer cisgender women spectators of horror report having been fans for as far back as they can remember. Combining this data with the following confidence intervals evidences that the majority of cisgender queer women were active fans of the horror genre as teenagers and, therefore, suggests that the data from Weiss study does not include queer teenage women. This conclusion was calculated using the normal approximation of the binomial distribution; the 99 percent confidence interval indicates that 53.2 percent to 62.2 percent of the total population of queer cisgender women spectators of horror would report that they were under 12 when they first started watching horror films. Similarly, the confidence interval also demonstrates with 99 percent confidence that 87.3 percent to 91.6 percent of all queer cisgender women spectators of horror were 17-and-under when they first started watching horror films.

While Making Sense of Cinema functions to highlight various empirical approaches to film studies, it also offers via the editors' introduction a succinct and informative review of the theoretical development of spectator, audience, and reception studies. Even though my work is not in direct engagement with a particular chapter, study, or scholar in Making Sense of Cinema, the entire collection presents a range of methodologies and methods—from observational research to eye-tracking technologies and from think-aloud protocols to online questionnaires—all from an interdisciplinary group of scholars engaged in empirical studies. Moreover, the aforementioned introductory overview enables me to better situate my work within the development and discourse of film spectatorship and empirical audience studies. In agreement with the collection's editors, CarrieLynn D. Reinhard and Christopher J. Olson, I understand film spectatorship as “the process of engaging with a film text” (2016, 2). Hence, throughout this study, my research participants are designated as horror film spectators when viewing horror individually and comprise horror film audiences when viewing together in various group sizes. And to avoid the “the trap of textual determinism” (Waldron 2016, 62), I am less concerned with the queer relationship to individual horror texts, and instead largely focus on the queer relationship to the horror genre. Film studies, whilst vying for institutional respectability, centered the power of cinematic apparatus and its filmic texts to underscore the academic worthiness of the medium, unfortunately leaving the active spectator undertheorized and disempowered. In the 1960s and '70s, as film studies was working to establish itself as a discipline, there was an overreliance on Barthesian semiotics, Althusserian structuralism, and Freudian/Lacanian psychoanalysis—all theorizing a passive and universal spectator (Reinhard and Olson 2016, 4). Jean-Louis Baudry's apparatus theory (1970/1975), a text-activated approach, further decentered the spectator in film studies, privileging cinematic structures over individual interpretations. With cultural historian Stuart Hall's encoding/decoding theory, some film scholars adopted the theory to create a reader-activated approach to analysis, an analytic approach that features an active spectator who will accept, negotiate, or resist dominant reading of the text (1973).<sup>46</sup> “Seeing problems with the idealization of the spectator in both of these approaches,” Janet Staiger offers a context-activated approach that argues “meaning does not belong primarily to either the film text or the film spectator, but through the interaction of the two in some specific context of engagement” (Reinhard and Olson 2016, 9). Staiger’s context-activated reception theory creates space for the spectator’s socio-historical realities that are integral to interpretative strategies, which “are derived in a material context” (1992, 58). Reception studies, as in Staiger’s context-activated approach, emphasizes the interaction between the film and the spectator and “interpretation, appropriation, sense-making and meaning-making all function as part of this interaction” (Reinhard and Olson 2016, 9). Yet Staiger employs a historical “found data” investigation of film spectators. This project, therefore, “scavenges” together empirical research with a context-activated reception study of the queer horror film spectator, which constitutes an audience when gathered with other spectators.

---

<sup>46</sup> Privileging spectatorial responses to a text (over the text itself) returns agency to an audience, which is fundamental to understanding the queer connection to horror genre. Therefore, unquestionably, this study owes a debt to Stuart Hall's contributions to audience and reception theory in which Hall establishes the active audience through both his encoding/decoding model

To that end, this study inaugurates a new application of audience reception studies since there has been little prior empirical research completed on horror film audiences and, to date, there is not a significant study focused on queer horror film audiences. The film industry began engaging with audiences to better understand their tastes and habits in order to better market films, exemplified by the 1946 establishment of the Motion Picture Association of America’s Department of Research (Handel 1950, 4). Prior to this, the limited audience research that existed was focused on “the educational aspects of motion pictures” (Handel 1950, 3) and “to address concerns about the susceptibility of vulnerable populations to mediated messages” (Reinhard and Olson 2016, 3). Yet, as Bruce A. Austin points out, “Leo Handel’s pioneering efforts in the late 1940s and ‘50s to adopt more systematic approaches to the study of film audiences remained largely a one-man effort” (1989, 23). This remained so until Bruce A. Austin’s study “Portrait of a Cult Film Audience: The Rocky Horror Picture Show,” published in 1981, which furthered the development of current audience research methodologies, including ones that are still employed, to better understand film audience preferences and reactions. In fact, Atkinson and Kennedy emphasize the importance of Austin’s empirical audience work when they state that the “audience research and the transcoding strategy, allowing the spectator to be able to reappropriate the meaning of a text.

---

methodologies deployed here build on but significantly extend a trajectory that can trace its origins to this [Austin's] groundbreaking study" (2018, 5). To also build on and extend Austin's work, through my engagement of queer horror fans, I develop deeper, nuanced insights about the "distance between what film theorists have thought that film was doing and what the film-going public believed about their experience" (Newton 2019, 18).

This study is framed at the juncture of empirical audience studies and spectatorial reception studies, with the findings nevertheless adding to critical discourses in other disciplines, such as fan studies.<sup>47</sup> While this study uses the term "fan," alongside terms such as spectator, this study is focused on how queer people "receive" and "interpret" the horror genre—both individually and as audiences; therefore, this work engages with audience reception studies over fan studies to understand the relationship between queer people and horror film. My thinking about queer engagement with the horror genre considers the conceptual and rhizomic overlaps between audience studies, reception theory, and fan studies—as informed by the works of Camille Bacon-Smith (1991), Henry Jenkins (1992), John Fiske (1992), Matt Hills (2002), Cornel Sandvoss (2005), Mark Duffett (2013), and Francesca Coppa (2014). Henry Jenkins and John Tulloch, for example, distinguish between "fans" who are "active participants within fandom as a social, cultural and interpretive institution" and "followers" who are "audience members who regularly watch and enjoy media," such as horror films, "but who claim no larger social identity on the basis of this consumption" (Tulloch and Jenkins 1995, 23). While this study did not analyze data on organized fandom or its concomitant culture, economy, products, and activities, the study is part of a cultural galvanization in which queers are finding an ever-increasing solidarity and social identity as queer horror fans.

This study, then, borrows from "the first wave of fan studies" and should be understood "as a form of activist research" (Gray, Sandvoss, and Harrington 2017, 3). This study has engaged in activist research to create the first comprehensive portrait of the queer horror spectator, with one aim to galvanize the community of horror-loving queers into a more connected network. Since <sup>47</sup> Future research has many fruitful avenues to investigate the queer spectator of horror film and consider a range of topics that will cement queer horror fandom in fan studies. For example, what does it mean for queer people to be horror "fans" within a fandom that is dominated by white cisgender heterosexual men? Or, what can we understand about fandom by investigating queer products and performances that express queer peoples' distinct relationship to horror and, thus, queer horror fandom?

---

this study privileges the data's consensus and queer solidarity, it bypasses engagement with fan studies' "second wave," which "highlighted the replication of social and cultural hierarchies within fan cultures and subcultures" (Gray, Sandvoss, and Harrington 2017, 5). This study methodologically utilizes an online survey and oral history interviews, both of which were completed by or with individual queer horror fans, thereby engaging with individualized fandom by forming a dataset based on those inputs, which the third wave of fan studies describes as "the relationship between fans' selves and their fan objects" (Gray, Sandvoss, and Harrington 2017, 6). However, this data collected from horror-loving queers is used in aggregate to argue for the imagined community of queer horror spectators. In other words, this study simultaneously investigates the opinions, habits, and tastes of the individual queer spectator of horror while arguing for the social identity of a queer horror community, therefore, functioning as a bridge between understanding fandom as an "individual engagement" and a "social identity" (Coppa 2014, 73). In order to cross that bridge, the theoretical foundation of this study remains grounded in audience reception studies, not the tenets of organized fandom, with empirical research as evidence for the claims. As Gray, Sandvoss, and Harrington have proclaimed, an "empirical shift" in research is vital to the third wave of fan studies (2007, 8), even if in horror studies this "wave" has been more like a stream, since empirical research of the horror genre still remains scant and dated. Dhoest and Simons, in 2012, argue for LGBTQ+ research "to back up its theoretical claims empirically" (260), yet horror studies remains grounded in theoretical assumptions principally bypassing empirical studies. Their call highlights the significance of this empirically-grounded study, which breaks ground for queer spectators in horror studies discourse by demonstrating how and why queer horror fans forge a distinctive relationship to the horror genre.

1.11 The Queer Horror Spectator and Queer Liminality

In each forthcoming chapter, I present arguments with data that prove the distinctive relationship that queers have with the horror genre. As this research project uses a mixed-method approach of collecting both quantitative and qualitative data, and my survey design also employs a mixed-method approach, Chapter 2 addresses the ethics, design, and implementation of both the questionnaire and in-depth interviews. It does this by analyzing and establishing the methodological foundation of this project, with a partial aim to provide a roadmap for future research. Borrowing principles from “community-based participatory research,” this study aims to empower research participants, or, in other words, “to work ‘with’ not ‘on’” the horror-loving queer community (Reisner and Hughto 2019, 5). Through discussion and analysis of research methodology and methods, this “Methodologies and Methods” chapter highlights the importance of research transparency. Chapter 3 presents the demographic information about the 4,107 survey participants. My survey was incredibly successful and yielded a large data set; therefore, I will introduce the overall aggregate data and highlight several salient sub-group distinctions from the data set, balancing larger patterns while highlighting distinctions. This will work to both underscore intersectional experiences and avoid essentializing the survey participants. The expositional nature of Chapter 3 functions to present the opinions, habits, and tastes of the queer horror spectator and to establish the diversity of queerness in horror fans. Chapter 4 delves into two interconnected topics that further elucidate the distinctive relationship that queers have with horror: trauma and camp. The mixed-method data supports an understanding of the horror genre as a therapeutic experience for queer spectators, who find a connection to horror through their lived experiences of insidious queer trauma. The queer community forges a camp relationship to culture and its artifacts as a survival tactic from the constant experience of queer trauma. Thusly, in order to survive the constant experience of queer trauma, the queer community forges a camp relationship to cultural texts. In Chapter 4, I analyze the queer camp-horror nexus, demonstrating incontrovertibly the importance of camp in the queer relationship to the horror genre.

A meaningful examination of queer horror spectatorship should not only document the quantitative and qualitative responses of queers about their consumption of horror film, but also analyze the queered reinterpretation/presentation of horror films through “live cinema” (Atkinson and Kennedy 2018) screenings that feature live drag performance prior to exhibiting a horror film. The addition of live cinema analysis when examining queer horror spectatorship is essential because reclamation and reinterpretation are a core aspect of queerness, with the interpretative horror performances of queer reclamation illustrating one of the ways that queers distinctively engage with horror. Chapter

5, therefore, presents case studies on the live drag horror performances of Peaches Christ's Midnight Mass (San Francisco, California) and Carla Rossi's Queer Horror (Portland, Oregon), investigations which function to add drag performance/horror exhibition research to the emerging field of live cinema, and situates queer horror screenings as "live exhibition experiences" that generate queered "modes of audience engagement within instances of collective cinematic consumption" (Atkinson 2014, 2). This study concludes with a summary analysis and indicates areas for further research, including the ways in which this study may be used to fill gaps in the critical canon of horror studies.

In addition to blurring the "boundaries between the researcher and the researched" (Detamore 2010, 177), this research ultimately amalgamates the theoretical, the practical, and the personal. I am inspired by Robin Wood who "believe[d] there will always be a close connection between critical theory, critical practice, and personal life" (1995, 13). My work, like my being, is a queer study beyond rigid boxes and norms, for "queer studies has staked its claim by working within, against, across, and even beyond disciplinary boundaries, thereby blurring distinctions between the field and its methods" (Ghaziani and Brim 2019, 4). The fabric of this project is made up of horror studies, queer theory, cultural studies, reception studies, and empirical audience research, all stitched together with queered methods, all filtered through my and my queer research participants' understanding of and experiences with queerness and horror. "If we stand by the argument that the knowledge resulting from research is a production rather than an observation," Detamore argues "then we do not have far to stretch to imagine the political in research" (2010, 178). This entire study is a political act of reclamation, as well as simply existing as queer—even in an age of increased assimilation. Miller argues that the death of the queer monster is due to cultural assimilation (2011) and Westengard discusses how assimilation is a form of cultural death (2019). The two theorists' ideas, taken together, should then be proven by data that shows queers have decreasing interest in horror. For, if queers were truly and meaningfully assimilated into mainstream culture, and therefore a distinctive queer culture did not exist, then a distinctive queer relationship to horror would not exist either. But instead, there is an ever-increasing interest in horror from a notable segment of the queer population.<sup>48</sup> In fact, while the sociopolitical forces of capitalism work to erode the radical queer into becoming an assimilated homonormative consumer market, conservative and religious institutions continue to take aim at stripping queers of human rights, an act that demonstrates how queers still remain in an uncanny liminal societal position. Exploring that liminal existence in Gothic Queer Culture: Marginalized Communities and the Ghosts of Insidious Trauma, Westengard examines “how gothicism allows queer folks to live in an unsettled space that honors their traumas and that offers a vision of queer past, present, and future that resists neoliberal and neoconservative narratives of temporality and subjectivity” (2019, 20). This “unsettled space” that queers occupy is the liminal in-between state of being between binarisms, between trauma and healing, invisible and visible, rejection and acceptance, nonlinear and linear. While queer representation and acceptance has increased, queer rights have largely come in the form of white cishomonormativity. Queers, and most especially our trans* and/or BIPOC family, remain the targets of familial, societal, political, and legislative discrimination and violence. And significantly, this uncanny liminal existence reinforces, rather than weakens, the queer connection to horror. Moreover, there will be members of the queer community who straddle the line between radicalism and assimilation, a line that in and of itself that represents distinctive liminality. While there are those of us who continue to live, love, and thrive in the liminal state, there will always be a community of horror-loving queers drawn to the radical queerness within horror.

---

<sup>48</sup> For example, the ever-increasing number of explicitly queer horror podcasts illustrates the relevance of the horror genre to queer spectators. When Patrick K. Walsh started the podcast ScreamQueenz: Where Horror Gets Gay in 2010, no other podcasts existed that analyzed and discussed horror films through a queer lens for a queer audience. While there have been and will continue to be horror podcasts that feature one or more queer hosts, such as Brother Ghoul's Tomb (premiered May 2020), Fright School (October 2016), Ghouls Next Door (October 2017), Girls, Guts, & Giallo (May 2019), Halloweeners (February 2018), and Horrorspiria (February 2019), explicitly queer horror podcasts have tellingly proliferated since 2017, including but certainly not limited to: Attack of the Queerwolf! (September 2018), The Boulet Brothers' Creatures of the Night (April 2020), Cocktail Party Massacre (May 2018), Copulators Die First (January 2019), Dead for Filth with Michael Varrati (August 2017), Dirty Little Horror (May 2018), Gaylords of Darkness (September 2018), Fear the Talking Queers (May 2020), The Film Flamers (August 2018), FriGay the 13th (February 2018), Homos on Haunted Hill (April 2020), Horror Queers (January 2019), Midnight Social Distortion (May 2021), Queer Horror Cult (October 2018), and Queers From the Crypt (September 2019).

Chapter 2

Methodology and Methods:

Queering Research, Statistics, and Institutional Norms

As long as they saw somebody like me there, whether male or female, they're seeing a person of color talking about their love of horror and giving their point of view. And that's like, Holy shit! That gives me hope! That's why I really want to be named in this research (Velasco 2020, 27).

I just want to thank you for really setting the stage through your work to include perspectives from people whose perspectives are really not considered in this genre (Contreras 2020, 23).

I am a horror fan. I own it. I own that phrase. I own that part of my identity more than probably I did at the beginning of this interview process (Fejeran 2020, 26).

You're participating in the hope of the world right now by being a queer person who's studying other queer people as it relates to something that you really enjoy. . . . It's sort of like the ethnography of queerness where you are becoming a queer historian in a way—and that is so fucking cool and important. And I feel like this is a part of queerness that has not been studied and it deserves to be looked at and, at the same time, let's make our canon this (Hodges 2020, 23).

In order to understand the queer relationship to horror, this project engaged queer horror spectators to create original data sets, resulting in the largest known data set of its kind. Collecting empirical data directly from the queer community has demonstrated that the queer horror film audience is “an important subject for study” (Cherry 1999, 29). An opt-in survey of self-identified queer horror fans establishes a demographic profile of queer horror film audiences including their opinions, habits, and tastes (which will be presented in Chapter 3), going beyond textual and extratextual readings and psychoanalytic discourse by combining theoretical and historical discourse on horror film spectatorship with empirical research. The Queer for Fear Oral History Collection functions as a resource for better understanding about how queers create meaning and make sense of their love of horror and how horror is integrated into their queer identity.<sup>1</sup> While there may be as many queer identities as there are research participants, this project congregates members of the LGBTQ+ population into one, a queer community centered on its love of horror that is rooted in “a queer world that affirms the non-normative, the odd, and the deviant” (Carnes 2019, 12). The online questionnaire data and oral history transcripts, created, implemented, and analyzed for this study, are the most robust quantitative and qualitative data sets of queer horror spectators to date, narrowing the delta between theoretical and empirical examinations of horror. One goal of this research is to empower others to tackle direct engagement with queers, horror fans, film spectators, and most especially horror-loving queers. As CarrieLynn D. Reinhard and Christopher J. Olson state, “theorization requires testing in the furnaces of reality; arguing for the nature of things must be subjected to the validity and reliability of testing made possible through empirical studies” (2016, 7-8). Part of that empowerment process is demystifying the arduous work of human engagement and to make clear, as Martin Barker et al. have before me, that “there is no such thing as perfect research” (2008, 16). Certainly, this is not a perfect research project; there are questions that remain unanswered, avenues left uninvestigated, and time and funding constraints. Yet as Matt Hills warned, “without the empirical study of actual audiences” (2014, 90), theorists will always have an incomplete understanding of the horror genre. Therefore, in an act of transparency that works to further legitimate my argument and to create a roadmap for future researchers who have not yet employed a mixed-method research approach, this chapter reviews the design, implementation, ethics, marketing, and analytical decisions that went into the project’s primary data collection methods: the online questionnaire and in-depth oral history interviews.

---

<sup>1</sup> I am archiving these 15 collected queer stories' transcripts as the Queer for Fear Oral History Collection via e-space, Manchester Metropolitan University's Research Repository, after my project is complete so that future researchers can continue to learn from them and then tell more stories.

2.1 A Queer Methodology and Queering Methods

Establishing a definition of methodology and methods is necessary for this study’s foundational framework. Quite simply, methodology is the thinking behind and consequences of any methods (data collection techniques) employed. Methodology, as defined by Browne and Nash, “can be understood as the logic that links the project’s ontological and epistemological approaches to the selection and deployment of these methods” (2010, 11). Methodology determines the methods; methods determine the data collected.

Methodologically, the “data-theory-method triangle” (Browne and Nash 2010, 21) framed how I approached the design of this project. This triangle elucidates how theory, method, and data are always interconnected. As Boellstorff explains: “What counts as ‘data’ depends upon the methods used to gather it and the theories used to explicate it; what counts as ‘theory’ depends on the data used to substantiate it and the methods used to support it; what counts as ‘method’ depends on the data it is to obtain and the theories it is to inform” (2010, 216). One must consider that “all data-collection techniques shape results” (Schlesinger et al. 1992, 32), and that any reading of the data is a manipulation of that data for a specific purpose. The purpose of this project is to focus on the queer spectator’s relationship to the horror genre using data from queer spectators in order to demonstrate that the queer experience ontologically, epistemologically, and phenomenologically aligns the queer spectator with the horror genre. This study privileges the similarities between queer spectators found in the mixed-method data, whereas a previous empirical investigation into women’s responses to televised violence examined “the variations that come about when we pay attention to the differences among women” (Schlesinger et al. 1992, 8).

An awareness of the methodological complexities in the doing of this project are paramount to the project itself and a key component of reflexive analysis. Since I am queer, my methodology will always come from a queer perspective. As the research of the collected scholars in Queer Methods and Methodologies (2010) and Imagining Queer Methods (2019) indicates, a queer methodology is fluid, tentative, iterative, and uncertain. Andrew King and Ann Cronin have recommended that we need “a methodology that is itself ‘queered’; that is, attuned to uncovering [cis]heteronormative presumptions in empirical data” (2010, 88). Moreover, as Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim explain, “methods are queered when we use the tenets of queer theory to tweak or explode what is possible with our existing procedures” (2019, 15). Since my thinking and decisions will be always already queer, I queered the data collection process, thereby making “queer” both a methodology and a method.<sup>2</sup> Universities, ultimately, need to reevaluate, re-frame, and differently support queer researchers and research projects since “queer methodologies speak to redefining ontological views, which frame everyday realities” (Muñoz 2010, 57). Hence, the attendant methodology and methods are queered, and, as well, this research stands as an example of “insider” research in which “a researcher conducts their study with a community to which they already belong” (Laurie and Jensen 2016, 51). As this chapter will illustrate, being a queer horror fan dictates every methodological decision I make, every method that I employ, and each step of my analysis. While I agree with Martin Barker, Ernest Mathijs, and Alberto Trobia that methodology is “less about right or wrong” and “more about decisions with consequences” (2008, 221), methodology also involves reflections and considerations about one’s own experiences, understandings, beliefs, and biases. Until white cisheteropatriarchal academia reconciles with its own understandings, beliefs, and biases, scholars doing work, for example, around queerness and queer intersectionality—scholars who queer the cisheteropatriarchal methodologies and methods—will continue to face difficulty receiving academic respect and advancement. Indeed, David P. Rivera and Kevin L. Nadal suggest that in order to fully support LGBTQ scholars, academia can queer its structures and processes in a number of ways. For example, the processes of tenure and promotion can be queered to include an appreciation for more diverse research topics, methods of inquiry, and publication outlets that may not fit neatly within the narrowly defined dictates that formally and informally guide these processes (2019, 201).

---

<sup>2</sup> The specifics of this are covered in detail in the next section.

As it stands, greater academic freedom and success only comes after one has proven oneself worthy within a particular set of standards, standards designed by, and to uphold, the white cisheteropatriarchy. As part of my queer methodology and method, I created this project at the juncture of being required to conform to white cisheteropatriarchal academic standards to pass examination and pushing the bounds of data evaluation and statistical generalizability. In other words, my mixed-method data collection adheres to established and sound methodologies. However, I also actively queer these methods and methodology by questioning specific academic norms in ethical approval and challenging statistical overreliance on mutual exclusivity and nonprobability.

2.2 Research Transparency and Statistical Interventions

Being transparent about the research challenges I faced will prove, I contend, to be a useful intervention. The objective of this intervention is to highlight specific academic norms that need improvement, improvements that will support both marginalized researchers and researchers working with marginalized communities. Specifically, the challenges around data analysis are salient because they demonstrate how statistical analysis is designed to maintain and perpetuate artificial divisions and uphold cisheteropatriarchal systems, particularly binaristic, fixed, and limiting notions of gender, sexuality, and race. Working with marginalized communities can offer “playful possibilities of unstable and indeterminate subjectivities and for transgressive practices that challenge binaries” (Browne and Nash 2010, 5). Following in the footsteps of Zandria F. Robinson and Marcus Anthony Hunter, my “approach queers what counts as social scientific data and decenters the questions of measurement” (2019, 175). Specifically, since statistical overestimation of probability sampling and mutually exclusive data function to deny nonnormative queer embodiment, I do not engage with them in expected methodological ways. Later in this chapter I will discuss probability and nonprobability sampling; however, here I will focus on the decision to privilege my participants’ emotional wellbeing and embodied experiences over the norms of statistical analysis.

One of the most common statistical tests of difference, the chi-square, relies on mutually exclusive data, which means a respondent is allowed to select only one option. The idea of mutual exclusivity (the idea that no respondent could be or inhabit two attributes simultaneously) is outdated and enforces binaristic thinking because many members of the queer community do not embody or think in a mutually exclusive existence or way. In fact, transgression and boundary pushing is built into queerness itself. Queerness is not fixed and static. For example, a person may identify as both lesbian and asexual. As well, a queer person may identify as nonbinary and cis. It would be contrary to their existence, and can be damaging to their psyche, to enforce selecting only one sexual orientation marker or one gender identity term. And, like Patrick R. Grzanka, I “suspected that our queer respondents might have more sophisticated and critical understandings of sexual orientation than heterosexual respondents, whose straight privilege insulated them from having to think much at all about sexual orientation” (2019, 90). Therefore, I made the active and political choice to allow participants to select as many races/ethnicities, sexual orientations, and gender identities categories as they personally identify with—thereby queering the established methods (Ward 2019, 262). As someone who embodies more than one category myself and who is often faced with the dehumanizing administrative task of relegating myself to a single category (much less finding a category that I understand myself to be), all in the name of mutual exclusivity, I would not uphold and enforce the same destructive norms on my queer participants. To this end, Grzanka discusses the queer need to “concentrate on the multidimensionality of sexual orientation beliefs, rather than the traditional psychometric priorities of parsimony and mutual exclusivity, so as to develop an instrument in which individuals could endorse multiple beliefs simultaneously, even if those beliefs might appear to contradict one another” (2019, 91). Studying nonnormative existences, thus, requires a queered approach to methods, a questioning of normative procedures.<sup>3</sup> In fact, my data set proves the need for all studies to open data collection to queer peoples’ nonnormative and/or not mutually exclusive lived experiences: 11 percent of all survey participants embody and selected more than one race/ethnicity, 15 percent of all survey participants embody and selected more than one gender,<sup>4</sup> and 38 percent of all survey participants embody and selected more than one sexual orientation—these data points collectively indicate that an overreliance on mutual exclusivity may prove harmful, unhelpful, and dated to a significant portion of the queer community. Since queers are a nonnormative community, it is imperative for researchers to open categories and measurement to those who exist at the peripheries of cisheteropatriarchal society. Therefore, this study contends and demonstrates that the academy should put less emphasis on mutually exclusive data and more emphasis on establishing methods for understanding and representing the complexities of identity and queer embodiment.

---

<sup>3</sup> Using myself as an example to Grzanka’s point: I identify as both a lesbian and post-binary. Some would question how I can identify as both post-binary and a lesbian, for those are seemingly in conflict due to the term lesbian having assumed dependence on one also identifying as a woman. Yet, I am each and both of those markers; rather than experience a conflict in embracing these so-called contradictory identity markers, I experience liberation and legitimacy.

<sup>4</sup> These data results reveal that queer horror spectators from all age groups selected more than one gender identity. Participants who selected more than one gender identity are as follow: 22 percent of 18-23 years old; 25 percent of 24-29 years old; 19 percent of 30-35 years old; 9 percent of 36-41 years old; 9 percent of 42-47 years old; 6 percent of 48-53 years old; 11 percent of 54-59 years old. Even though younger participants selected multiple genders at a higher rate, this speaks to the fact that Millennials and Generation Z were raised during a time of greater understanding of gender. Conversely, Generations X and older lived the majority of their lives under a binaristic understanding of gender: male and female. The fact that a significant percentage Gen X and older participants identify with more than one gender bolsters claims for the nature of queer as a shared marker of personhood and as a mode of analysis.

2.3 Reconsidering Institutional Norms

Institutional research norms and practices functionally impede queer research by requiring adherence to white cisheteronormative practices. As Gust Yep explains, “[cis]heteronormative thinking is deeply ingrained, and strategically invisible, in our social institutions” (2003, 24). It is important to question institutional norms and call for organizational reconsiderations because to not do so normalizes and upholds processes that advertently and inadvertently harm the marginalized members of society. My experiences related to such institutional norms as a queer scholar researching a queer community underscores the necessity for and provides a case study of queer research methodology and methods. While discussing the complexities and contradictions of all institutional norms related to human-subject research is beyond the scope of this study, I find it necessary to provide a brief discussion about some of my experiences working within current institutional norms because there are queered methods that would not place research participants in any harm yet could enhance the research experience and output.

Firstly, the current normative institutional review process worked to alienate me from both my university and my queer horror community. Mathias Detamore underscores this point, stating that the ethical review process “often works to shut down and alienate the researcher from the researched rather than ‘protect’ human subjects” (2010, 177). In reality, ethical research is built on a reciprocal relationship between the researcher and the research participants, a relationship filled with nuance; human subject review boards should re-evaluate how they insert themselves into that relationship-building. Receiving ethical approval was an online process, with all accompanying forms and instructions taking a one-size-fits-all approach.<sup>5</sup> This experience indicates that there is reliance on a single prescribed process in order for assurance that all institutional research is ethical, rather than an opportunity for the development and use of unique approaches that could include queered research methods. “Concerns about liability,” not the interpersonal dynamics and relationships of research, “still influence the decisions of some university research ethics boards <sup>5</sup> Manchester Metropolitan University, as with all research institutions, requires that each project receive ethical approval in order to ensure that research projects undertaken are ethically compliant.

---

(REBs) at the institutional level” (Janovicek 2015, 73).<sup>6</sup> Since “ethics are inherently methodological,” there needs to be ethical consideration from all parties involved, including those seeking to review and approve the projects (Detamore 2010, 169). Indeed, since there is an unfortunate history of unethical research (medical and nonmedical alike), research participants do need to understand their rights and the expectations of the proposed research; research participants need to understand that they can maintain power throughout the process. However, the human subject review process inadvertently disempowers the research participants. For example, as Nancy Janovicek notes, oral history narrators should decide whether or not they want to be named in research and “ethics policies and practices that assume that research participants cannot make this decision are condescending” (2015, 81). Potential research participants need to be reminded of their power more than they need to be protected. In fact, by the time I completed my ethics review, I was in agreement with John Mueller, who states that “particularly in the field of non-medical research, the institutional review process is more accurately described as censorship than safety screening” (Mueller quoted in Detamore 2010, 177). In all, the process to receive ethical approval took well over a year to complete<sup>7</sup> (including one application and four amendments), yet was necessary since this study is predicated on the participation of human subjects in my research—research that includes an online questionnaire, 15 individual interviews, and being a participant observer at Queer Horror screenings in Portland, Oregon.<sup>8</sup>

The first amendment request sought to allow Manchester Metropolitan University (MMU) to retain my questionnaire’s fully anonymized aggregated data and to make it available to future researchers via e-space, MMU’s Research Repository, after my project is complete. I sought this amendment in order to

---

<sup>6</sup> The implementation of the EU General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) on May 25, 2018 created new standards for data protection and privacy to which this research adheres. GDPR considerations as applicable to this study are discussed in this chapter.

<sup>7</sup> This research project received a favorable ethical opinion, via EthOS, the University’s online ethics application system, by the Arts and Humanities Research Ethics and Governance Committee in February 2019.

<sup>8</sup> Due to the COVID-19 pandemic, I had to abandon plans for a second survey aimed at the Queer Horror audience, as the pre-pandemic theatre-based cinema-going experience has been cancelled for the foreseeable future. My intention was to run a survey marketing ad on-screen and hand out paper flyers at three or four Queer Horror screenings in order to drive Queer Horror audience members to the survey’s online URL.

ensure that my unexpected success in procuring such a large groundbreaking and valuable data set would serve and be of value to the university and future researchers in further studying this demographic.<sup>9</sup> Future use of the data is important because, since this study stands as an important yet single subjective usage of the data, there are many more stories to be told and understandings to be made from the collected data sets. The proper preservation of data should be a paramount goal of any research—it should be built into the ethics process to prevent research hoarding and single-use data sets. Data preservation not only creates a useful level of research reliability and transparency, but also, since research objectivity does not exist, ensures that a single data set can receive myriad analytic narratives from myriad perspectives. Ultimately, I received approval on this amendment, after my second attempt to preserve my aggregate data.<sup>10</sup> As a final note, while I am required by ethics board regulations to destroy the questionnaire’s raw data, I emphatically agree with Annette Kuhn, Daniel Biltereyst, and Philippe Meers when they argue that researchers and universities should “make raw data—interviews, surveys and so on—more widely available, possibly for re-use by future researchers. Although not currently a widespread practice, this could be helpful in testing the validity and reliability of research findings, as well as offering opportunities for further analysis and deeper interpretation of existing research data” (2017, 11). Institutions ought to actively work with researchers to ethically retain raw research data in order to gain even more value and learning from it.

A critical role of institutional review boards is to foster ethical research practices, which should continue to be reconsidered and evolved. One such suggestion is for future guidelines to require oral history narrator honorariums be provided for persons from marginalized communities. For the interview portion of my research, I concluded that I needed to emphasize representation of Black, Indigenous, People of Color (BIPOC) and/or trans* research

---

<sup>9</sup> Other MMU departments and institutions also shared this desire; in fact, after engaging the university library regarding my research, I received an email response stating that MMU “would very much wish the [anonymized aggregated] data was kept and made available at MMU and via e-space.”

<sup>10</sup> I generated over 6,000 individual aggregate data reports for future access and use by researchers via e-space, MMU’s Research Repository. In other words, I retained a substantial amount of combined data in focused reports since the raw data will be destroyed at the conclusion of this project. I chose to provide this additional labor out of respect for and belief in the value of my research community.

participants in the oral history interviews, with a goal of more adequately representing their voices, since the online survey yielded a slight overrepresentation of cis white participants.<sup>11</sup> When I put out a public call on social media to draw in those BIPOC and/or trans* narrators, I was met with important and respectful criticism, a reminder that needed to be heeded: to pay the most systemically vulnerable members of an already marginalized community for their time. The United States (US) is currently in the midst of a much-needed social justice reckoning, a time during which many individuals are working to correct ongoing systemic racial injustices. In humanities-based academia, students and professors are expected to do unpaid labor and, in turn, create new knowledge from others' unpaid labor. This process is built into the academic system and has become the "norm." By not proactively finding a way to do this part of my study differently than that norm, I was perpetuating the built-in racism, misogyny, and homophobia of the academic (and social) system. Specifically, I was perpetuating unpaid labor of LGBTQ+ and BIPOC people, even in my effort to work toward better diversity and inclusion in an academic research study. For this project to have its full meaning and value, it remains imperative to document voices and perspectives from the widest spectrum of people in the queer community. These in-depth interviews are not only critical to the success of this project, but also provide MMU with further research material that will prove valuable for future researchers. The ethical issue at hand, then, is the need to compensate oral history narrators for their time; to continue in-depth research without compensation is the unethical route.<sup>12</sup> I applied for and eventually was granted funds that allowed me to offer a modest honorarium to my BIPOC and/or trans* narrators.<sup>13</sup>

---

<sup>11</sup> At the time of the respective interviews, 80 percent of the oral history narrators were over the age of 30, 47 percent are BIPOC, and 27 percent are trans*. Even though there are far fewer narrators than survey participants, the narrators' oral history interviews are far more in-depth and nuanced than the survey.

<sup>12</sup> I strongly recommend that researchers who work with marginalized communities offer an honorarium to their one-on-one research participants as recognition for their emotional and intellectual labor. It is important to note that this honorarium did not change the outcome of my research; instead, it acts as a token of trust building and is a small indication of mutual respect for people from marginalized communities. Furthermore, none of the nine selected narrators chose to be interviewed because of the honorarium; instead, the honorarium illustrates that I am actively doing the work needed to challenge and change racist, misogynist, and homophobic systemic norms and to honor their time and the value of their life experiences.

<sup>13</sup> I had already completed interviews with six narrators when I put out the request for BIPOC and/or trans* narrators. Since all of my narrators come from one or more marginalized communities, I chose to present the honorarium option to the initial six narrators and to ask if they would be willing to forgo their honorarium so that I could offer more to upcoming BIPOC

Another institutional norm that needs to be questioned and appropriately challenged is the overemphasis on anonymity in research. In point of fact, “emphasis on privacy and confidentiality has been a key point of contention between REBs [research ethics boards] and oral historians” (Janovicek 2015, 79). Throughout the ethical review process, I had to repeatedly assure the review board that I would ensure narrator anonymity. However, this is a dangerous norm because forced anonymity can function as yet another form of erasure and marginalization. Originally, I stated in my EthOS application that I would only name interviewees Joshua Grannell (aka Peaches Christ) and Anthony Hudson (aka Carla Rossi) in my research project, as they are both public figures and the research subjects of Chapter 5, “Drag Me to Hell: Queer Performance and Live Cinema.” These drag horror hosts were chosen for in-depth interviews precisely because of their work as horror exhibition programmers and performers. However, after receiving ethical approval and delving further into my oral history interview work, I realized that I needed to submit an amendment requesting for me to allow other narrators to be named if they desire.

Since queer horror is a burgeoning subfield in horror studies, preserving these interview transcripts with individuals at the intersections of queerness and horror are of value to MMU and future researchers. This third amendment request initially stemmed from the fact that I had to interview some individuals who produce podcasts, and since they are “public figures” through that work and their podcasts are integral to their relationship with horror, it would prove impossible to maintain those narrators’ anonymity. Furthermore, delving back into oral history methodology, I was reminded that oral history is an act—the active act of remembering and telling—that never can be “anonymous or impersonal” (Portelli 2003, 14). In fact, in the act of creating oral histories, “the rememberer and the teller are always individual persons who take on the task of remembering and the responsibility of telling” (Portelli 2003, 14). I, therefore, requested that the ethics board approve an amendment that would allow me to name any public figures I interview, including horror film stars and horror and/or trans* narrators—each one of them swiftly and enthusiastically agreed. I am grateful for their generosity and for enabling me to do better for the marginalized members of our community. I applied for and received a Research Support Award for US$450 to offer the remaining BIPOC and/or trans* narrators a modest US$50 honorarium.

---

podcasters, who choose to participate and elect/consent to being named. Hence, on the consent form, I designated narrator categories as “public figure” and “private citizen”—a public figure would be named in the research and a private citizen would remain anonymous. I did not realize the issues with that nomenclature, however, until my first interview with a narrator who did not have a podcast but wanted to be named; they cited the power in being named and, thus, visible. Visibility is power; therefore, it is critical to honor a transfer of power within the research dynamic as narrators want to be named.<sup>14</sup> This experience taught me that using the nomenclature “public figure” and “private citizen” was shortsighted and only serves to uphold a norm that keeps obfuscated power with the researcher. For, as Ulrika Dahl argues, “a clear downside of anonymity is that it also serves to reproduce the hierarchy of a named author and the unnamed ‘informant’” (2010, 158). As this misleading nomenclature functioned to muddle my intent, I took extra care to discuss the difference between public figure and private citizen with each narrator. When I did so, I became aware that one nomenclature was misleading to others, with one narrator assuming that “public figure” meant that they needed a blue verification check mark by their social media handle in order to select that option and, thus, be named. In the end, all 15 narrators in this study chose to be named. Furthermore, all 15 narrators were shown the sections of text in which they were quoted, and were given a chance to ask questions, make comments, or request edits. My action to engage the narrators in this way works to maintain the power in their hands and to actively work against “muffl[ing] the voices of participants while authorising that of the researcher” (Manzo and Brightbill quoted in Bradley 2007, 346). Additionally, this same amendment made explicit my intention to archive the interview transcripts as part of my research, as I was not explicit in my original application and did not want to leave any room for exclusion or erasure during the preservation stage. Ultimately, this and previously highlighted experiences provide examples of institutional norms that should be reconsidered to not only better include historically marginalized

---

<sup>14</sup> Queer people and queer organizations have continually utilized and mobilized the power of visibility in the historical and ongoing fights for queer survival and liberation. One example that underscores visibility as power is the “Silence = Death” rallying cry, which became prominent in queer activism in the late 1980s and into the 1990s when it was adopted by AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP) as its now-iconic representation of the HIV and AIDS crisis in their fight for community survival.

communities in research, but also best collect and retain data.<sup>15</sup>

2.4 Privacy, Protection, and Proximity in Data Management

Consent, transparency, and data protection are foundational to ethical research and I paid careful attention to protect participant privacy. Having received a master's degree in history, with a concentration in public history, and having worked as a professional oral historian for eleven years, I ensured that any and all interview participants were informed and consenting. I informed all research participants of the goals and aims of this project for their understanding of what will happen with the data collected and how it will remain protected. Additionally, all narrators signed both the written Participant Information Sheet and Informed Consent forms (see Appendix A). One of my goals was to ensure that research participants understood the purpose and nature of this research project, as well as their participation in and contribution to it. I created an online questionnaire that I distributed following a digital marketing effort with social media engagement that sought to reach a wide range of self-identified queer spectators of horror films. I paid careful attention to protecting participant privacy per General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR), avoiding collection of identifying details such as name, city of residence, phone number, or email address. I conducted the questionnaire using Online Surveys, the password-protected online platform that MMU licenses for student use, as my survey provider and data custodian. The Online Surveys design allows for inclusion of an introductory privacy notice for potential participants (see figure 2.1). In addition to this privacy notice, the questionnaire included my name and MMU email address for any follow-up questions, allowing participants the ability to opt-in and engage with me for any further communication, providing transparency with their ability to obtain a further level of engagement in the research process.

Informed consent is a baseline of my research project; however, the Online Surveys did not provide me with an option for a written consent form. Therefore, online questionnaire participants provided their informed consent by proceeding with the questionnaire after accepting and advancing past a message that states: “The completion of this survey implies your informed consent to participate.” Online Surveys adheres to GDPR regulations and provides the requisite strengthened data security (including not using cookies when participants complete the questionnaire). I also proactively chose to adhere to the United Kingdom’s (UK) GDPR laws on data protection (implemented in 2018), the world’s most stringent privacy laws to date, since the US does not have a comprehensive federal data protection law and Canada’s Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act does not offer nearly as many protections as GDPR. By imposing a self-regulatory measure to adhere to GDPR regulations, I ensured that any data that I might have collected from anywhere in the world could be kept. Since my planning and preparation ensured that the questionnaire adhered to and maintained GDPR standards and regulations, I appealed to retain all survey responses and the amendment was approved. The questionnaire was self-selecting; potential participants needed to self-identify as both queer and a horror fan and elect to start and complete the questionnaire. Hence, the power to complete or not complete the questionnaire was completely in the hands of those who learned about my research project. All data or information included from the questionnaire or any participant-provided follow-up remained anonymous. Throughout the research process, all data was password protected and no raw data was shared beyond my assigned MMU advisory team. All data within Online Surveys will be securely destroyed once I complete this research project (the raw data will be stored until my degree commencement or until Online Surveys securely deletes the survey data, whichever comes first). Moreover, while the questionnaire collects sensitive personal data, such as sexual orientation, the questionnaire is designed and handled to maintain respondent anonymity.

---

<sup>15</sup> To underscore the value for a researcher to have human guidance and support during the ethical review process, my EthOS experiences proved more efficient and clear once Sue Baines, Chair of Faculty Research Ethics and Governance Committee, Arts & Humanities, took the time to understand and subsequently expedite my final two amendments.

Lastly, as an active participant in queer horror screenings—including Midnight Mass and Queer Horror—I have included my observations from participating in those events. I was only ever a participant in Midnight Mass, but I have been a participant and researcher with Queer Horror. My years of being a Midnight Mass employee and attendee ended over 15 years ago, whereas, I started attending Queer Horror in 2015, nearly two years prior to developing this research project. Vivar explains that “being a participant as well as a researcher proved to be useful for getting an insider view of the event” (2017, 120). My research methodology has aligned with Vivar’s observation, because being a Queer Horror regular who took on the role of researcher offered me ongoing meaningful engagement with the event series and its attendees. In my role as a participant observer of the Queer Horror experience, I functioned as a “subcultural analyst [who] not only observes and records the behavior of the group under study, but also participates in the community” (Marchetti 2008, 417).<sup>16</sup> My position as a queer “academic-fan” (Hills 2002, xxvi)—in my case being both an institutionally-affiliated academic and a lifelong fan of horror—is entwined with my scholarly output as well as my relationship to horror fandom. For example, my fannish participation in both Queer Horror and Midnight Mass events bolsters my academic connection to these series, while my active academic observations bolster my experiences as a queer horror spectator at these events. In other words, my academic training informs my relationship to horror and my love of horror informs my intellectual pursuits. All of the privileges and understandings that come from my years of academic training are now inseparable from my lifetime of passion for the horror genre and participation in queer horror communities. I am in firm agreement with Cécile Cristofari and Matthieu J. Guitton when they state that “being an aca-fan is not only useful to study fan communities, it is arguably necessary” (2017, 726). I further proclaim that queer embodiment is, in fact, necessary for studies about the queer community. Thus, both my queerness and my love of horror are explicitly and necessarily a part of this study. Matt Hills observes that “many scholars are themselves fans of the genre they are writing about, but although their fandom frames the act of study, it does so implicitly” (2014, 90). Indeed, in my case, being a horror-loving queer is both intrinsic and inextricable from why I undertook this research and how I read queer and horror theory, interpret empirical data, and connect with other queer spectators of horror. The academic-fan, nonetheless, must heed the impact of their hybrid identity on the data analysis. Because “the risk of bias does not always stem from proximity” (Cristofari and Guitton 2017, 725), developing multiple methodological approaches functions “as a means to facilitate a complex, multifaceted investigation of the subject” (Pett 2021, 22). For this study, my multifaceted methodological approaches included generating and employing quantitative and qualitative data, in combination with my role as an aca-fan participant observer. Furthermore, throughout the research process, I prioritized the data results to keep my data analysis sound methodologically—and to ensure the fan remained in balance with the academic.

---

<sup>16</sup> Similarly, Paul Hodkinson details his journey in Goth: Identity, Style and Subculture “from participant to researcher,” reclaiming fandom from within as a critical technique for his ethnographic study of the goth subculture (2002, 1). As with Hodkinson’s undertaking, this study “required that I become a critical insider, continually taking mental steps back so as to observe, compare, contrast and question as well as to experience” (2002, 6; italics in the original).

This balance was particularly important in studying the live cinema event case studies. Conclusively, my fannish proximity to the queer live cinema events, both Queer Horror and Midnight Mass, strengthened my engagement with and analysis of them, including knowledge, access, and experience.<sup>17</sup> My enjoyment of Queer Horror, as an ongoing series, is inseparable from my study of the individual events and vice versa. Since I had prior experience as a Queer Horror regular, I then consciously sought to function as a researcher, documenting and paying closer attention to details about both the performances and the audiences. The main research outcome was to report on these horror screenings to describe the logistics, organization, and presentations of the screenings. My observations about these events preserve anonymity and do not include any identifying characteristics or details of audience members or individuals other than the opted-in drag performer interview narrators. My observations will accurately describe the scene for those who have never been to a “queered” horror screening in order to further understanding of the queer horror community. Thus, my history, understanding, and authenticity as a fan was in service of my status as an academic researcher.

2.5 Survey Design Methodology

Questionnaire development is an iterative process. While the design of survey questions depends on the focus of the research, adhering to best practices will

---

<sup>17</sup> Even still, there were inadvertent proximity blindspots, in which my biases had a direct influence on the approaches to researching these events. For example, during the survey design I knew I was going to collect data about drag horror hosts, so I used the terminology “drag queen” instead of the more inclusive “drag performer” because of my depth of experience with Midnight Mass, which is presented by Peaches Christ, a performer who uses the term “drag queen.” Notwithstanding, this minor matter of proximity was determined not to alter the results; the qualitative data indicates that survey participants who have attended horror screening with a range of drag performers answered the question, providing further details about the different kinds of drag performance, from drag kings to drag clowns, in the open text box.

elicit the best data possible. Since I was crafting new questions as well as updating existing ones from the empirical studies conducted by Brigid Cherry (1999) and Amy Jane Vosper (2013), I sought to understand better what constitutes proper question development. The four fundamental and deceptively simple guidelines for writing successful survey questions are: “make questions clear, answerable, easy, and unbiased” (Harris 2014, 60). I designed the survey to incorporate a variety of question types, including yes/no, ranked response, bipolar scale, multiple choice (select one), multiple choice (multi-select), 1-5 Likert scale (measures directionality, intensity of response, and usually includes a neutral midpoint), demographic, and open-ended questions. Furthermore, I included options such as “Don’t know,” “N/A,” and open text boxes, which all serve to make survey questions answerable, curb question bias, and improve the quality of the data (Harris 2014, 95-97). Moreover, I purposely and pointedly did not include any psychometric questions due to the long and recent history of psychology pathologizing queers.<sup>18</sup> I consciously only asked a single question at a time and designed the questionnaire with demographic data coming later in the survey, since starting with personal questions can be uninviting, whereas if demographic questions come later in the questionnaire, participants are more invested in completing the survey (Harris 2014, 52). One of my key methodological goals was to craft a questionnaire that prioritizes openness and options since “fluidity and dynamism characterize queer thought” (Jones and Adams 2010, 204). Therefore, my questionnaire design included open text boxes.<sup>19</sup> Martin Barker et al. make the argument for including open-ended text boxes on surveys since “audience responses to films are complex, even when they are short. They can include feelings, views, and opinions that are not easily condensed into numerical codes” (2008, 9). Providing open text boxes on select questions that may have more complex answers gives survey participants more power to speak to their experiences—experiences that I might have failed to seek or include in fixed-answer options. For example, knowing whether or not the presence of a queer character affects survey participants’ enjoyment of a horror film is important, but knowing the ways in which the presence of a queer character affects their enjoyment of a horror film is vital. In other words, a targeted selection of my questions included an “other” open-ended text box option that allowed survey participants to add something different and speak directly to their experiences, or engaged them “to explain what their answer means” (Barker et al. 2008, 10; italics in the original). Once the questions were written, I engaged an experienced Research Survey Methodologist to review my questionnaire,<sup>20</sup> thereby adhering to sound questionnaire design methodology (Harris 2014, 198). Next, I pretested the questions as well as the questionnaire design, and subsequently edited them accordingly, to assess the structure and clarity of the survey before I “soft launched” in April 2019 (Harris 195, 2014). Pretesting a questionnaire functions to engage potential survey participants directly to receive valuable feedback on survey design and to improve question answerability, understandability, and objectivity. For example, a pretest helps confirm that any conditional skip patterns (a question in which the participant’s answer determines which question is presented next) work properly for branching questions. Instead of immediately releasing the questionnaire to my full target audience, I soft launched the survey. A soft launch involves sending the questionnaire to a small sample before the digital marketing campaign and wider survey release, or the hard launch (Harris 193, 2014).

---

<sup>18</sup> In 1973, the American Psychiatric Association in their Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) declassified homosexuality as a mental disorder—formally ending the psychological treatments used to “cure” homosexuality, such as ice-pick lobotomies, electroshock therapy, and chemical castration. As well, “over the years, the mental health field has shifted from pathologizing homosexuality toward trying to understand the experiences of LGB persons, and in 2011, the American Psychological Association (APA) updated its guidelines for working with LGB individuals” (Lytle, Sherer, and Silenzio 2019, 225). In 2013, the DSM-5 replaced Gender Identity Disorder (GID) with Gender Dysphoria. As of November 2020, conversion therapy is still routinely practiced today, with only 20 states and Washington, D.C. having laws that ban conversion therapy for minors (see, https://www.lgbtmap.org/equality-maps/conversion\_therapy).

<sup>19</sup> The demographic information section of my survey opened with the following statement for participants to read: “Collecting demographic data for a diverse community can unintentionally leave some persons feeling unrepresented or unseen. With inclusivity as a goal, nearly every question provides an open entry box if the best answer for you has not been provided. The below demographic information is being collected for aggregate data analysis about queer fans of horror film, not for individual examination, and your identifying details will not be connected with your answers” (see Appendix B for complete survey).

From its inception, my project was inspired by Brigid Cherry’s empirical research on female horror fans in the UK and intended to be rooted in the experiences, opinions, and perceptions of queer horror fans. Whereas Cherry distributed a paper questionnaire, technological and Internet advancements

---

<sup>20</sup> In February 2019, I reviewed my questionnaire with Portland-based Survey Methodologist, Jeanne Snodgrass, who has over 25 years of experience in survey design and evaluation. Snodgrass acted solely in a questionnaire-advising capacity to inform the clarity and usability of the survey questions.

Queer Fans of Horror Film

---

Page 1: INTRODUCTION

You must be at least 18 years old to participate

Thank you so much for taking the time to complete this questionnaire. The goal of this research project is to understand the habits, tastes, opinions, and experiences of queer fans of horror. Aggregate results and selected quotes from this questionnaire will remain anonymous when included in my doctoral dissertation at Manchester Metropolitan University's Centre for Gothic Studies. This questionnaire should take about 20 minutes to complete.

Your participation is voluntary. You do not have to answer any question you do not wish to, and you can withdraw at any time before you submit the completed questionnaire. There are no anticipated risks or discomforts associated with your participation and we have taken multiple steps to protect your data privacy and confidentiality, including hosting the questionnaire on Online Survey, which adheres to General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) regulations, provides requisite strengthened data security, and does not use cookies when participants complete the questionnaire. The questionnaire, moreover, will not collect names, phone numbers, or email addresses and all raw data will be securely deleted upon the completion of this research project.

The completion of this survey implies your informed consent to participate.

FIGURE 2.1. Opening page of the online questionnaire, documenting the research purpose, age restriction, anonymity, data security, confidentiality, and informed consent.

have made digital surveys not only a possibility for my research, but also the best choice for my data collection. Working in the digital realm simultaneously helps and hinders questionnaire responses. The distribution of the questionnaire online affords a potential to reach vastly more humans than the distribution of a paper survey; however, there is no way to communicate or remind potential respondents to complete the survey, as the potential pool of respondents remains unknown. Ultimately, an online survey was the best method in 2019 to reach and include as many participants from the queer community and have a meaningful response rate. I also adapted and reframed select questions from surveys created by Cherry (1999) and Vosper (2013) for my questionnaire.<sup>21</sup> Adapting and reframing questions from previous related studies serves to directly compare these studies and to establish the queer spectatorship of horror film as a distinct mode for theoretical exploration, creating a baseline goal and set of questions for future horror audience study. I sustained the goal to collect data from horror spectators about their horror opinions, habits, and tastes, and updated the methods, vocabulary, and question-phrasing to achieve greater questionnaire clarity and to make it appropriate for twenty-first century queer communities. Furthermore, I created a questionnaire with 66 questions in order to expand the research area, extending the human subject engagement beyond Cherry and Vosper, whose questionnaires asked 24 and 29 questions respectively.<sup>22</sup> For my questionnaire, I crafted original questions that specifically address topics of my research interest and relevancy to horror, including queer demographics, drag queens, drag queen horror screenings, horror hosts, queerness, catharsis, trauma, camp, horror musicals, podcasts, social media, leisure activities, and ephemera.

2.6 Scope of Research

Instead of considering this research “unconsciously Western in scope,” this research is consciously a Western project, as my training and experience do not warrant a truly global perspective (Galt and Schoonover 2016, 38). For example, I do not have the training or experience to speak to the relationship between queerness and horror in an Asian or African context. Moreover, given the dominance of American horror films worldwide, coupled with the fact that “white, middle class, well-educated people tend to more strongly identify as LGB in the first place,” this Western focus seems not only justified but necessary (Sandfort quoted in Dhoest and Simons 2012, 265). To be clear, my decision to limit this research scope speaks more to a specific research focus rather than a lack of interest or need. Furthermore, as my survey engaged with queers and collected data from around the globe, I want to emphasize the need for further research in this area, in particular because the differences in data from around the world seem to be rooted more in issues of access, hence exposure, to queer and horror events than differences in national identity.<sup>23</sup> Instead, my collected data illustrates that “the expression of identification” as horror-loving queers on a global scale “can serve as the outward affirmation of their allegiance to an imagined membership of a transnational LGBTQ community” (Waldron 2016, 66). Originally, I targeted collecting data within the United States, a focus based on the fact that I have much greater access to horror-loving queer communities in my home country.<sup>24</sup> As of this writing, no scholars have created an original data set on North American horror spectators from the queer community. Given these reasons, as well as the (culturally imperialistic) influence of US horror films globally, I felt it both sound and justified to focus the scope on the US. An Internet-based online survey, by its very digital nature, would not be limited by national borders. But since digital surveys are global in nature, difficult to track, and challenging to limit, I designed the survey to allow and accommodate responses outside of the US if I were to obtain them, even if I did not target them. In fact, my research survey organically spread globally, attracting respondents from around the world, including 897 survey participants from the UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand, as well as 375 survey participants who do not live in the US, the UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand.<sup>25</sup> Therefore, for my data analysis, I designated three categories where the queer horror spectators lived at the time they completed the survey: “the United States,” “the United Kingdom, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand,” or “elsewhere in the world.” The tremendous participant response created an international survey of queer spectators of horror, demonstrating that horror is an affective genre with global appeal. Since a significant number of voices from outside the US contributed, retaining their data for my analysis and the historical record for future research became imperative. Losing this significant number of survey participants, 1,272 queer people, would not only weaken the study, but also function as a mechanism of silencing the queer participants who made the time to answer a 66-question survey. Therefore, I submitted another amendment to the Research Ethics and Governance Committee to be able to retain all non-US-based survey responses.

---

<sup>21</sup> Vosper’s questionnaire largely repurposed Cherry’s questions, as Vosper was directly engaging with the original study.

<sup>22</sup> Illustrating the exhaustiveness of this study’s 66-question survey (with multiple questions having up to 24 sub-questions), and the success of its response rate, Cherry’s questionnaire was considered “substantial” at 24 questions (Cherry 1999, 64).

---

<sup>23</sup> While the data collected from the US, the UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand, and elsewhere in the world reveals nationality-based statistical differences in opinions, habits, and tastes, these differences are seemingly due to differences in access to horror products such as horror magazines (limits which could be exacerbated by language barriers) and queer events such as drag hosted horror shows. For example, only 4 percent of the survey participants who live outside the US or the UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand have seen a drag horror host (compared with 18.6 percent of the US participants and 11.2 percent of the UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand participants). Yet, an impressive 84 percent of those survey participants would like to see a drag horror host (compared with 71.9 percent of US participants and 74.5 percent of UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand participants). Correspondingly, the survey participants who live outside the US or the UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand are less likely to have seen a drag show (40 percent have seen a drag show), attended a live musical adaptation of a horror film (11.2 percent have attended a horror musical), attended a horror convention (5.9 percent have been a horror conference attendee), read horror magazines (10.1 percent read horror magazines), or seen a horror host on TV (33.6 percent seen a TV horror host). Moreover, lower percentages of participants who live outside the US or the UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand collect horror films (45.1 percent collect Blu-rays, DVDs, LaserDiscs, VHSs, or any digital forms of horror films compared with 66.7 percent of US participants and 66.6 percent of UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand participants) or purchase horror memorabilia and/or collectibles (50.9 percent purchase memorabilia/collectibles compared with 65.5 percent of US participants and 60.7 percent of UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand participants). A lack of access to horror products may be a contributing factor to these participants having the lowest reported rate of horror knowledge, with 69.6 percent considering themselves knowledgeable about horror film (compared with 84.1 percent of US participants and 83.7 percent of UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand participants). These data results reveal the necessity for further research to find new information about both international horror fans and global queer populations, specifically to learn about these populations’ relationship and access to horror films, collateral, and events.

2.7 Participant Recruitment and Engagement

Once the questionnaire was created and active online, I subsequently recruited potential questionnaire participants, which I did primarily through digital methods and tools. In point of fact, the Internet played a critical role throughout this entire

---

<sup>24</sup> This focus replicates the work of Brigid Cherry (1999), who studied female horror fans in the United Kingdom.

<sup>25</sup> If the survey participant did not currently live in the United States or the United Kingdom, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand, there was no further follow-up question nor open text box. The country of origin is not known for 375 of the survey participants.

research project, including access to primary and secondary sources, the administration of a web-based questionnaire, staying connected to my academic advisors, and conducting oral history interviews. As such, this research is an Internet-mediated research (IMR) project and “involves the gathering of novel, original data to be subjected to analysis in order to provide new evidence in relation to a particular research question” (Hewson 2017, 57). Whilst unknown factors permeate the marketing and data collection stages of this project, this seems appropriate since queers encounter an existence replete with unknowns. For example, queers face every new meaningful acquaintance or interaction knowing it can be laden with an unknown testing ground of queer acceptance, of their own acceptance as a human. From the outset of my research, I looked to implement bimodal methods for participant recruitment—online and in person. Survey recruitment is critical since “two of the more difficult aspects of survey research are getting respondents to agree to take the survey and keeping them in the survey once they start” (Harris 2014, 51). Even though Diane Binson et al. have warned that the “major drawbacks to web surveys involve sampling and response rates” (2007, 411), the success of this web survey rests on social media posts, reposts, and reshares. My outreach plan included a social media campaign, targeted outreach to social media influencers, direct email marketing to civic and university LGBTQ+ centers, and in-person engagement at both a horror film screening and a horror convention. While marketing the online survey via social media channels could foster results that favor the participation of younger participants, the ease and affordability of using social media outweighs potential detriments. My digital marketing methods included posting the call for research participants on my social media and reaching out to a number of LGBTQ+ centers. The language of the outreach was informational, focused on the fact that a new academic research project seeks the participation of queer horror fans (see figure 2.2). Reshares and reposts by both known and unknown individuals further spread the information in organic ways. Because I had already identified the target population, I utilized numerous channels to reach as many individuals in the queer community to participate via both on- and offline sources, including podcasts, social media, flyers, and magazines. For example, I created the @queerforfear Instagram account prior to undertaking this research and built an active engagement with thousands of followers.<sup>26</sup> I utilized this social media account both as a personal outlet to engage with horror-loving queers and as a way to build a community base for my research, including the questionnaire and oral history interviews (Laurie and Jensen 2016, 115). Social media as a recruitment platform has become well-established, particularly for reaching marginalized communities (Sloan and Quan-Haase 2017, 20). Since the data was collected via voluntary response, inherent bias is built into the sampling method, but, as mentioned, I took great care to craft questions that are clear, answerable, easy, and unbiased in order to mitigate my research bias (Robson and McCartan 2016, 59-65). My goal was to disseminate the online questionnaire link as far and wide as possible to reach my target of at least 220 participants.

When an online survey is released to a world of potential participants, knowing how many people will see the survey or how many will actually take the time to complete the survey is impossible. Since external surveys typically have a 15-20 percent response rate (Edmonds and Kennedy 2010, 134), my goal was to reach nearly 2,000 queer horror spectators in order to reach my minimum target response rate of 220, doubling Brigid Cherry's 109 questionnaire respondents (1999, 72). While I set a minimum response goal, I sought to get more respondents and, thus, obtain the largest "n" number (sample size) possible to legitimize this community and in order to proactively and silently respond to the "positivist gatekeepers" who evaluate the significance of research in stark statistical terms. In the words of Ghaziani and Brim, these research gatekeepers are "best handled by flaunting large sample sizes" (2019, 18). Some other comparable studies provide useful comparison sets to establish sample significance. Richard McCulloch and Virginia Crisp secured 220 responses, which is deemed "a high volume of survey responses" (2016, 191), and Rosana Vivar conducted an online questionnaire with 108 respondents (2018, 119). Alexander Dhoest and Nele Simons received 761 survey participants, after filtering out 75 heterosexual respondents, which they state is a "very well received" survey (2012, 265-266). Emma Pett's "large-scale qualitative study" obtained 709 participants (Hughes 2016, 39) and Philip Schlesinger et al. in Women Viewing Violence obtained 546 completed surveys

---

<sup>26</sup> The @queerforfear Instagram account has 3,579 followers as of June 2021.

(1992, 16). The research in Horror Films: Current Research on Audience Preferences and Reactions feature  $n$  numbers such as  $n = 312$  (Lawrence and Palmgreen 1991),  $n = 155$  (Tamborini and Stiff 1987),  $n = 220$  (Johnston and Dumerauf 1990), and  $n = 92$  (Edwards 1991). In fact, the largest  $n$  number in Horror Films is  $n = 1,573$ , which does not represent human respondents but 1,573 violent acts that were coded across 30 slasher films (Molitor and Sapolsky 1993). In comparison, this research study received 4,160 total research participants, and after filtering out the 31 cisgender heterosexual respondents and 22 blank, or mostly blank, responses, my final  $n = 4,107$ . Of the 4,107 responses, I received 177 surveys from queers who answered “No” to the first question “Overall, do you consider yourself a fan of any type of horror film?” Ultimately, I retained that data because of the complex nature of fandom and what might be learned from those who do not identify as horror fans but still have a relationship with horror. My research response rate directly speaks to the success of this survey, the increased statistical power of a large sample, and, most importantly, the desire of so many queer horror spectators to have their opinions, habits, and tastes researched and known (Laurie and Jensen 2016, 306).

The selection of oral history narrators was a circuitous process that involved known and new queer community. I was friends with two of the narrators, Joshua Grannell and CJ Hodges, before the inception of this doctoral research, having been friends with Grannell for over 20 years and friends with Hodges for nearly a decade and both being friends with whom I have shared the experience of watching horror films. All other narrators became known to me through the course of this research via social introductions or my social media account based on our shared love of horror. Even though I worked with narrators from multiple countries and multiple states within the US, the community strengthened and friendships grew because the shared love of horror has united us as queer horror fans, bolstered by our roles in the queer horror community as artists, performers, writers, filmmakers, teachers, podcasters, and more.<sup>27</sup> The Queer for Fear Oral History Collection narrators are: Gabe Castro, Harmony Colangelo, Lana Contreras, Jason Edward Davis, <sup>27</sup> Narrator Kim Thompson recognizes the connective pull of the queer horror community when she states that “it is testament to the queer horror community that you tend to gravitate towards each other, even by accident” (2020, 12).

---

Mark Estes, Joe Fejeran, Joshua Grannell, Alex Hall, CJ Hodges, Anthony Hudson, Stacie Ponder, Kaitlyn Stodola, Kim Thompson, Michael Varrati, and Christopher Velasco. I chose to interview these 15 narrators in order to ensure there would be enough varied experiences and voices to expose both patterns and differences in the queer horror fanbase, as well as conduct a significant but manageable number of interviews. Selecting 15 narrators also allowed me to intentionally represent and emphasize a diversity of voices since racism and transphobia far too often push the life experiences of BIPOC and trans* members of the queer community to the periphery of our already peripheral social experience. Of the 15 oral history narrators, seven narrators are BIPOC and eight are white; two narrators are transgender and two non-binary, while 11 are cisgender. One narrator's pronouns are they/them; one narrator rejects pronouns altogether; six narrators' pronouns are she/her; and seven narrators' pronouns are he/him. As will be discussed further in this chapter, this study would not be the vibrant document it is without the oral history voices further expounding, supplementing, and amplifying the survey data.

2.8 Data Characteristics and Considerations

Survey design determines the characteristics of the data collected. This survey collected data from participants who were 18 years or older<sup>28</sup> at the time of taking the survey, who self-identify as both queer and horror fans, and for whom an online English-language survey would not pose a technological or linguistic barrier. From the outset of creating the research questionnaire, I had already determined the population that I wanted to survey since this research project is directly generated from my queer love of horror and my experiences with queer horror fans. And I also knew that I would employ a self-selection (participants choose to complete survey) online questionnaire since it is the most efficient “low cost” way to reach potential survey participants and to have the data “automated,” thereby bypassing data entry errors (Bryman 2016, 235). One

---

<sup>28</sup> Minors are legally unable to consent to research participation, therefore the questionnaire was restricted to adults aged 18 and over since the methods for both the quantitative and qualitative data collection for this research project is predicated on participants providing informed consent. Moreover, while a parent/guardian can provide informed consent on behalf of a minor, this practice could prove harmful or dangerous if potential minor participants seek permission from parents/guardians in homophobic and/or transphobic households to participate in a study centered on queerness.

ARE YOU QUEER FOR FEAR?

LET YOUR MONSTER OUT OF THE CLOSET.

A new study is seeking horror-loving queers to take part in the first extended survey about how LGBTQ+ people view horror film. The goal of this research project is to better understand the habits, tastes and experiences of queer fans of horror.

IT'S EASY!

All you have to do is complete an online questionnaire. The questionnaire is anonymous and will take about 20 minutes.

<https://mmu.onlinesurveys.ac.uk/queerforfear>

This survey is part of PhD research being conducted at the Manchester Centre for Gothic Studies at Manchester Metropolitan University.

For more information, please contact:
Heather O. Petrocelli,
PhD Researcher
heather.petrocelli@stu.mmu.ac.uk

You must be at least 18 years old to participate

FIGURE 2.2. Recruitment flyer distributed digitally online and physically at Crypticon Seattle 2019.

detriment to exclusively using an online platform for survey-based research is the Internet having an access barrier. Since many people do not have access to the Internet on a daily basis, if at all, researchers need to be mindful of this consideration. This barrier naturally could exclude anyone without predictable or consistent Internet connection. Yet, as this is a survey focused on queers' enjoyment of horror film, a recreational cost barrier to the horror genre (and film) already exists; it costs money to see horror films in the theatre, to purchase horror films for the home, and/or to stream horror films. Conversely, using the Internet to create research samples within queer communities "has great benefits and the potential to address gaps in present sampling methodologies," especially increasing the potential to reach queers both rurally and globally (Meyer and Wilson 2009, 29). Online Surveys conveniently compiled my digital questionnaire's data automatically into an easily navigable database (Barker et al. 2008, 18).

As I was not present with any research participant completing the online survey, each participant had to read the online instructions to complete the survey, thereby taking part in a self-administered survey. Significantly, this makes the survey respondents active participants in my research project (Laurie and Jensen 2016, 147). In fact, I employ the terms "research participant" or "survey participant" throughout this study to underscore their active engagement with this project and the fact that I share this project's success with all participants. Moreover, since the horror-loving queer community is an unknown, hidden population, it would prove to be "a population that is hard to reach through random sampling" (Dhoest and Simons 2012, 265), and, arguably, "impossible to randomly sample" (Ghaziani 2019, 106). This survey, therefore, is not a random probability sample in which every queer horror spectator had an equal opportunity to complete the survey or, in other words, a survey in which "everyone in the population has non-zero chance of being selected" (Laurie and Jensen 2016, 97). That would have been an impossible task because I could never actually know the full queer horror population (Barker, Mathijs, and Trobia 2008, 222). Instead, this survey is a nonprobability sample, a sample in which some queer horror fans had "zero chance of being surveyed" (Laurie and Jensen 2016, 97). Yet, importantly, nonprobability sampling can still yield a representative sample (Laurie and Jensen 2016, 97) and is an appropriate methodology to engage considering all factors. In other words, while a nonprobability sample is not random, the sample is still representative and I, as the researcher, can make statistical inferences from the data. In fact, as Claire Hewson determines, “a number of studies across a range of research areas and disciplines have shown that IMR [Internet-mediated research] studies using Internet-recruited samples, including non-probability volunteer samples, can generate high-quality, valid data comparable to that achieved offline, even in cases where broader generalisability is required” (2017, 66). Statistical methodology often delineates sharp categorical distinctions, yet research often does not or cannot adhere to strict categorization. For example, when determining which nonprobability sampling method to employ, I found that my research crossed strict sampling definitional bounds and required borrowing from multiple sampling methods. I have, therefore, a nonprobability sample that includes aspects of online sampling, purposive sampling, availability sampling, snowball sampling, targeted sampling, and self-selection sampling.

2.9 Oral History Methodology

Beyond survey responses, a researcher’s utilization of oral history methods can uncover the complexity of human emotions, perceptions, and experiences, all of which show how meaning is always a projection of the present upon the past. Indeed, oral history is memory work, a memory method. Yet memories are reconstructions; memories are not static truths, but ever-shifting interpretations. Oral history is an intimate act of creation in which the personal becomes political and the political becomes personal. Oral history is an act of an interviewer “actively and dialectically co-producing data” with the narrators (Muñoz 2010, 61). However, university human-subject review committees at times work to undermine the intimate process of oral history in the name of research “ethics.” Ethics boards need to reassess their role in human-subject research since, as Detamore pointedly comments: “Human subjects review boards pose a myriad of problems for queer and social science research that define, limit, and/or delegitimise research relationships” (2010, 175). Such concentration on distinguishing between the researcher and the researched creates a false dichotomy. Instead of focusing on oral history as a shared, intimate creation in which both parties are simultaneously the researcher and the researched, this forced delineation also decenters the work of the narrator and inadvertently creates a distinctive power dynamic that privileges the role of the researcher over a socially marginalized person's power in telling their own story.

In the case of my role in this research, the pre-interview functioned to explicitly inform a narrator that we will remain on equal footing, investigating the topics of queerness and horror together. I reminded them that there is no wrong answer, that anything that they had to say is valuable, and that they ultimately held the reins and could stop the interview at any time for any reason. The pre-interview also functioned as a space for me to be honest, vulnerable, and open; to develop a rapport and to be clear about my motivations and intentions so that when we were conducting the recorded interview, we had an established dynamic. To this end, Walter L. Williams finds "that if a person reveals a particularly personal detail, it helps for me to throw in some intimate detail about my own experiences. This simple act makes the interview less of a one-sided probing of informant by researcher and more of an exchange of information among equals" (2012, 122). Oral history standing as an exchange between equals was fundamental to my process. While an equal exchange is not possible for all oral history projects, I am a horror-loving queer interviewing other horror-loving queers and, thus, partook in a peer exchange. All 15 narrators and I quickly built a bridge together, a connection coalesced by our queerness and our love of horror—a bridge that was not destroyed the moment the interview was completed.<sup>29</sup> An oral history interview is a snapshot of two people engaging on a topic at a particular time and place, with endless variations on the direction an interview can proceed. In one setting, an interviewer can elect to follow up with additional questions about something the narrator mentions; in another setting, the interviewer could choose to hold off on that additional line of questions in order to steer the dialogue in another direction. The perspectives of both the interviewer (delving and inquiring with follow-up questions) and the narrator direct the possible routes of an oral history interview. This interaction underscores the reciprocity of the process and the product. In other words, interviews are the unique and singular intersection of perspective, location, intent, and time. Oral historian Valerie Yow reminds us that “all research is biased in its subjectivity, simply because the research begins, progresses, and ends with the researcher, who, no matter how many controls she may put on it, will nonetheless be creating a document reflecting her own assumptions” (2005, 7). I would argue further that all oral history has a two-fold bias—that of the research and that of the narrator. While an interviewer lays a foundation, through the act of reciprocity, a process of give and take, the interviewer and narrator together construct the document.

---

<sup>29</sup> Indeed, I continue to have friendships with numerous narrators. What struck me about all 15 interviews was the generosity of the narrators and the investment the narrators exhibited to ensure the success of the interview and their transcript.

In the construction and transmission of memory as a form of theoretical exploration, oral history is a creation, not a discovery. Oral history is political, personal, and powerful. Oral history methods can operate “to acknowledge that theory is lived and begins with the people” (Robinson and Hunter 2019, 166). Oral history is a “transformative space” (Heckert 2010, 52)—certainly when queers come together, space is queered and transformed. Oral history is a “research method that is based on direct intervention by the observer and on the evocation of clear evidence,” with the use of oral history in research being critical because it “can offer answers to questions that no other methodology can provide” (Yow 2005, 9). While incredibly valuable, oral history is time intensive, requiring generous allotments of time for recruitment, research, pre-interview, interview, transcription, analysis, and presentation. In fact, the process for each oral history interview included narrator recruitment and research, a pre-interview and an interview (between researcher and narrator), interview transcription, transcription review, transcription analysis, and, finally, providing public access to the transcriptions. In all, each narrator’s interview required the researcher’s commitment of over 20 hours. Even with robust mixed-methods survey data collected from 66 questions, I always planned to create and include in-depth interviews as a key qualitative method. In fact, since my entire project serves as the creation of a new queer space within horror studies, these collected oral histories further serve as the creation of a new queer space—a queer space created between the interview narrators, myself, and any future queers who read the transcripts. Moreover, since my voice leads this study, I sought to engage other individual queer horror fans across a spectrum of lived intersectional experience to be “interview partners” with whom I could delve deeper into the meaning of our horror spectatorship and experience (Klesse 2006, 579). Importantly, without directly engaging a spectrum of queer horror fans through in-depth oral history interviews, my analysis would lack a depth of knowledge about queer spectators' "opinions or intentions" within the horror genre (Freund and Fielding 2013, 330). "Oral history gives a voice to the kinds of memories that are seldom written down and would therefore normally be lost" (Kuhn, Biltreyst, and Meers 2017, 10). For example, without my direct in-depth interview engagement, I would have not understood the ways in which horror films flow through life stories, nor how horror is built into queers' identities. My oral history interviews also illustrated further how horror connects with queerness and how queerness connects with horror.

In all, my interviews with 15 individual narrators form the Queer for Fear Oral History Collection, which function to move beyond "high abstraction and a reliance on theory" by grounding analysis in the audience's lived experience and emotion (Rooke 2010, 26). Certain emotions and experiences are simply not quantifiable; qualitative data interviews are the best option for researchers "to hear the meaning of what interviewees tell them" (Rubin and Rubin 2012, 6). Simply stated, "interviews and focus groups can be an invaluable means of answering the 'how' and 'why' in your research question" (Laurie and Jensen 2016, xxi). As a distance student without access to my university's physical spaces, I elected to not conduct focus groups because of the lack of a proper location to facilitate, and instead to focus on a meaningful number of in-depth interviews. Each narrator's interview stands as a subject-centered document that illustrates how oral history methodology not only amplifies marginalized voices, but also enhances research meaning by infusing the theory with human emotion. Like E. Patrick Johnson, "I also am not invested in an uncontested 'truth' so much as I am in the validation of the narrator's subjectivity" (2019, 57). Collectively, the Queer for Fear Oral History Collection functions not to uncover objective facts or truths, as those do not exist, but instead to reveal 15 distinct subjective realities. Together, the interviews help me better understand the how and the why of horror in the narrators' lives. As Horacio N. Roque Ramírez cleverly states, oral history is "historiographic activism," which means that creating oral histories can insert otherwise undocumented voices or experiences into the historical record (2008, 182). With few financial restrictions and an ability to create visibility, the power of oral history as a medium, a skill, and a tool is extraordinary; oral history actively works against the “devastation of silencing” (Ramírez 2008, 171). To actively counter the long history of queers being silenced or erased, I will provide numerous full quotes from the oral history narrators and survey participants, as opposed to editing the transcripts down to shorter clauses or synthesized ideas. This method preserves the oral history narrators’ subjectivity in order to reiterate that each narrator is an individual queer horror expert worthy of dedicated space in scholarship. Continually embedding truncated narrator quotes into my own sentences and ideas would serve to detract from and erase their intellectual labor.

2.10 Interview Transcription Methods

Oral history can provide a space in which personal experience is transformed into community empowerment when individual stories are shared in the public realm. In this case, the experiences, emotions, thoughts, meanings, and understanding of this project’s 15 interview narrators are available to future researchers via archived transcripts, in a collection, in addition to this study being publicly available. All together this research, with its concomitant data sets, has the potential to transform the horror-loving queer community. Dahl perceptively remarks that “a central value of queer studies resides in collaborations and conversations that aim to produce knowledge collectively” (2010, 144-145). I came together with 15 individual narrators both to make and mark a queer space in horror fandom. To assert our voices. To tell our stories. The knowledge that we collectively create through these interviews will serve to create a knowledge collective in and for the queer horror community. Preservation and access are foundational to proper oral history methodology, as well as historical equity; archiving the transcripts of this project’s research interviews will ensure the posterity of important lives and knowledge. My decision to archive the transcripts but not the recorded interviews stemmed from a distinct event and the desire to further queer my methods: the COVID-19 global pandemic and a determination to relinquish more power to the narrators. 2020 was a trying year for many people, with the economic and social repercussions of a global pandemic and racial justice uprisings disproportionately affecting marginalized communities. Many people, including my narrators, have been experiencing hardships, heightened emotions, and an abundance of anxiety throughout 2020. Additionally, since the pandemic and subsequent lockdowns rendered in-person interviews unsafe and impossible, I decided to conduct all interviews over the phone or video chat (except the first interview that was conducted in person in early March 2020). While this decision rendered narrators' physical location irrelevant and proved valuable in allowing the inclusion of voices from around and outside the US, the variance of audio and video quality based on narrators' Internet connection and equipment proved to be an issue at times. Taking into consideration the sociopolitical context in which this oral history collection was created, combined with inconsistent technology, I further decided that all interviews would only be available to the public as transcriptions and that I would not archive the digital audio files of the interview, instead working with each individual narrator as I transcribed and they subsequently edited their interviews. As I researched and reflected further about the oral history process, particularly in regards to public preservation and presentation, I decided that the narrators would have greater control over their stories during this process if they were given the final transcript to review and directly edit, with my partnership and support. All narrator edits clarified intention or corrected any misinformation without altering the original meaning of the interview, conversation, or response.

Transcription, at its base, is the creation of a written document from an oral interview. An interview is a historical document that is co-constructed by two individuals, with each interview being the product of the time and place of its creation; the same two people doing the interview in a different location or on a different date would result in a different historical document. Further, the resulting document is about human experiences and perceptions. In other words, oral histories are innately infused with life. To transcribe that document feels, at times, like stripping away layers of the lived experiences and even as though the transcription process alters the interview's meaning. While the transcriber encounters many potential pitfalls in the process of transcribing, the transcription of oral interviews into written documents is a critical way to ensure both preservation and public access to an interview. Although technologies change over time, the written document has only slightly shifted since the beginning of recorded history. Transcription of an oral interview into a written document ensures both its preservation and its utility—especially since “researchers invariably prefer transcripts over recording” (Ritchie 2003, 64). Furthermore, future access does not rely on technologies that could become obsolete. Moreover, in my case, the act of transcribing an interview that I co-constructed proved to heighten my understanding of the interview. I better understood what my narrator said due to listening to the recording over and over in the process of transcribing, and carefully reflecting on what was actually being said.<sup>30</sup> Thus, the transcription process has value beyond preservation and public access, for the process allows connection to the interview content in a more meaningful way, which will alter the way I both understand and interpret the interview into a document of its own. If properly constructed, the interview “transcript represents the intended meaning of what was said” (Ritchie 2003, 66). Fundamentally, a final, edited transcript is a transcriber’s interpretation of what they hear on the recording. A transcriber chooses what punctuation goes where (which can alter meaning), adds emphasis to particular words, and decides any necessity for further clarification by adding information in brackets. Moreover, the transcriber determines, to a certain extent, meaning in the interview by how they interpret and construct the spoken word into the written form. What one transcriber hears in the recorded interview (especially if they were the interviewer, the co-creator of the document) could undoubtedly differ from what another person would hear. The art of infusing an interview’s “life” into the stark black and white of transcribed pages involves a seemingly endless series of decisions. Indeed, as Donald A. Ritchie states: “Transcribing is more of an art than a science” (2003, 72). These decisions ultimately can shift not only the meaning of the interview, but also its value. Another decision the transcriber makes is the type of transcript to create. For example, a semi-verbatim transcript allows for the removal of false starts and most extraneous filler words without losing a person’s idiolect. While stripping away spoken speech patterns and utterances could change the value of a primary source document for some researchers, particularly linguists, speech pathologists, or cultural specialists, I chose to center transcript readability and create semi-verbatim transcripts from my interviews. Furthermore, the process of transcription is a process of editing. One of the transcriptionist’s goals is to “clean up” the document without changing the meaning of the interview. My own transcription process underscores these points, as well as the bias present in all historical documents. Everything historical is created with a specific intention, motivation, mindset, and audience—transcripts are no different. While I accurately represented my narrator and the interview in each transcript, in the process of creating a semi-verbatim transcript, I inherently altered the actual reality of a recorded interview. Meaning does not lie inherently with an interview; the process of examination and interpretation creates meaning. In other words, a transcript is an interpretation, a translation—not a duplication—of an interview. As Walter Benjamin noted: “The task of the translator consists in finding that intended effect [Intention] upon the language into which he is translating which produces in it the echo of the original” (1968, 76; brackets and italics in the original). While Benjamin was speaking specifically to language translation, the translator’s task remains the same when converting spoken conversation into a written document.

---

<sup>30</sup> Following the example of Barker et al., “as a matter of courtesy” I have corrected misspelling and typos in the survey participants’ written responses for readability and clarity (2016, x).

2.11 Statistics within the Humanities

While utilizing transdisciplinary methodologies, this study, at its base, is a humanities research project. My main research objective is to uncover queer spectator emotions and experiences, with much of the quantitative data being analyzed to make qualitative inferences. As David F. Harris confirms, “qualitative research is exploratory, quantitative research is largely confirmatory: It helps us confirm or reject the hypotheses we developed from our qualitative research” (2014, 20). Using the Statistical Package for the Social Sciences (SPSS), I analyzed quantitative data from my survey, some in direct comparison to the limited existing data on horror spectatorship, to establish and present a portrait of the queer horror spectator and to confirm my hypothesis that queers have a unique relationship to horror film, a queer genre. Fundamentally, statistics involves collecting, organizing, analyzing, and presenting data, and empirical research is data collection and presentation. This study utilizes charts, graphs, and/or tables to summarize and present the collected data. In further preparation to engage with my questionnaire data, I took a college-level statistics course and worked with a statistics tutor to better understand how to read and analyze the collected data.<sup>31</sup> Online Surveys has a built-in analytics tool that allowed me to cross reference different data points. Designing, implementing, and marketing a questionnaire all ultimately served to collect data that realizes its value through analysis and in support of queer people's stories. As Robinson and Hunter suggest, "following queer theory's aims to tear down and reimagine, we might decenter measurement and the way it has come to be defined in neoliberal and social scientific terms and focus instead on people and stories" (2019, 166). Therefore, I privilege the queer people—their stories and experiences—behind the data over the statistical analysis of the data itself. Importantly, this method is necessary since there is a great need for queering survey methodology itself—statisticians and mathematicians must advance statistical theory. As previously mentioned, I will straddle the line between currently accepted academic norms and queering methods. In order to pass the current standards of doctoral research I must partially adhere to norms; however, these norms (especially statistical norms) erase and/or render invisible queer existences and experiences. Therefore, to study queer communities, researchers and academics must evolve existing and create new methodologies and methods "to mitigate the violence of traditional methods" (Love 2019, 35). Since I created a nonprobability sample and the majority of my demographic data is not mutually exclusive, in my chapter on data, Chapter 3 "Portrait of a Queer Horror Fan," I judiciously employ various statistical tests to analyze, investigate, assert, and underscore the opinions, habits, and tastes of the queer horror spectator. Statistics is a mathematical theory, a language, and framework, not an objective reality. Because "probability sampling theory is well established and based on sound mathematical principles, whereas nonprobability sampling is not" (Cornesse et al. 2020, 22), current statistical theory overemphasizes probability sampling even though true probability sampling is difficult and expensive to obtain. And even though "probability and nonprobability sample surveys often share a common goal: to efficiently estimate the characteristics of a large population based on measurements of a small subset of the population” (Cornesse et al. 2020, 6-7), statistics privileges probability sampling and its concomitant mathematical tidiness. However, both reality and research are not tidy, which demands a middle ground in which researchers, particularly researchers working with marginalized communities, can create a nonprobability sample and theorize to a larger population. With nonprobability sample surveys “validity is topic and survey dependent” (Cornesse et al. 2020, 7). As such, for this research, creating a nonprobability sample was both valid and the only prudent option.

---

<sup>31</sup> In Summer 2016, I completed Statistics I (MTH243), a five-credit-hours (the equivalent of 50 lecture hours) course. The course content and outcomes included, but were certainly not limited to, statistical thinking and terminology, sample design, estimating population parameters by calculating confidence intervals, and statistical significance testing. I also completed seven one-on-one tutorial sessions with a local statistician, specifically focusing on learning the statistics software package employed for this study, as will be detailed later in this chapter.

To meet the norms of data analysis and statistical testing, I present both descriptive (describing the data for a precise understanding) and inferential statistics (making predictions about the data’s generalizability to the larger population) to evidence my argument that queers have a distinctive relationship to the horror genre. Realistically, a researcher could not create a probability sample from the population under investigation here, queer horror spectators, because the true population could never be known. Therefore, to embark on this research, a nonprobability sampling was implemented, a sampling method often disallowed from inferential statistics as “there is no general statistical theory of nonprobability sampling that justifies when and why accurate inferences can be expected” (Cornesse et al. 2020, 7). According to that “norm,” nonprobability sampling is critiqued for not being able to properly adhere to statistical standards of generalizability to the greater population. However, I challenge this assertion, not statistically, but theoretically due to the exclusion of inferences and conclusions for a non-mutually exclusive (a more complex) community. As all humans (no matter how messy or complex as a data set) deserve and are compelling to study, statisticians need to address the value, accuracy, and generalizability of nonprobability sampling—especially “since the majority of survey data collected online around the world today rely on nonprobability samples” (Cornesse et al. 2020, 6). As such, I have pushed the boundaries, as have some other researchers, to demonstrate nonprobability sampling in use with accuracy and generalizability for this queer population.

A large international research study that investigated the accuracy of both probability and nonprobability sampling concluded that “accuracy in probability sample surveys is generally higher than in nonprobability sample surveys” (Cornesse et al. 2020, 22). Yet, the report never describes or speaks directly to what “generally higher” actually means. Statistically speaking, these mathematical differences, whilst real, could be quite small. In fact, the differences are likely small enough to not actually mean much to a study such as this, a study of queer people’s horror film tastes and habits, as opposed to, for example, a study determining medical treatments in which these small differences could have life or death consequences. The potentially greater accuracy of a probability sample is moot for a humanities research project—and not just because it would have been impossible to create. Even if greater inaccuracies do exist, impacting my ability to generalize this data set to the entire queer horror population, little to no evidence exists that these potentially minor inaccuracies are practically significant. Following the recommendation of Vasja Vehovar, Vera Toepoel, and Stephanie Steinmetz “to [be] more openly accepting [of] the reality of using a standard statistical inference approach as an approximation in non-probability settings,” I present data and draw inferences from my nonprobability sample (2016, 342). While data sets created from nonprobability sampling do not foster the greatest statistical accuracy, the collected data are also not automatically replete with bias and errors. Instead, working with nonprobability sampling requires both an acknowledgment of limitations and research transparency. And, indeed, “very careful planning must precede nonprobability sampling” (Meyer and Wilson 2009, 25). Meyer and Wilson further appeal to researchers that, while “researchers, reviewers, and journal editors” should critically evaluate sampling methodologies particularly in research that involves queer community members, “they should not adhere to such strict guidelines that would thwart progress and impede gaining important knowledge about the lives of LGB people” (Meyer and Wilson 2009, 30). To date, the limited number of empirical horror studies have yielded smaller data sets which, subsequently, have led to starkly cisheteronormative understandings of the horror audience. Smaller data sets have limited range, so they more easily allow for blanket statements about the population under study; whereas larger data sets reveal greater variations in the communities under study. In other words, “sample size affects power and statistical conclusion validity, not external validity” (Meyer and Wilson 2009, 30). Because my survey yielded a large data set ( $n = 4,107$ ), I can be extremely confident that any differences found are real even if they are not large. Stated differently, with my large sample size I can detect differences in my participant population, horror's queer community, which allows for more reliable conclusions.

My goal in the presentation of statistical tests in this research “is to determine whether a consistent, predictable relationship exists and to describe the nature of the relationship” (Gravetter and Wallnau 2011, 562). As previously stated, I will be presenting both descriptive and inferential statistics, each having distinct yet important roles in making meaning out of the relationship queers have with the horror genre. Descriptive statistics describes the data and inferential statistics allows for generalized inferences from the data. I will present analysis from frequencies, confidence intervals, chi-square tests, correlations, and t-tests using SPSS. I present frequency charts and graphs, a descriptive statistic, for many of the survey questions to form the foundation of my data presentation. Frequency charts will showcase collected data for each question via valid (participants who answered the selected question) and cumulative (those who answered the entire survey) percentages and hard counts (actual participant counts for the question). General confidence interval, an inferential statistic, uses the sample survey data to calculate the estimated  $\pm$  margin of error to which the analyzed data is generalizable to the true population.<sup>32</sup> This means that I will present data that shows with 99 percent confidence that the true proportion of all queer horror spectators would exist within the given interval. Or, said differently, the confidence interval calculates with 99 percent confidence the percentage range of how everyone in the queer horror population (not solely those who answered the survey) would have answered the question. As Vehovar and Manfreda remind: “Not long ago” the American Association for Public Opinion Research (AAPOR) “still required that confidence intervals could only be calculated with probability sample surveys. However, this strict attitude is slowly softening” (2017, 150). As such, I will offer confidence intervals in my research analysis with the qualification that the data findings represent “indications” and “approximations” of the true proportion of all horror-loving queers (Vehovar, Toepoel, and Steinmetz 2016, 341). In summary, when I present my findings, I will state that the confidence interval indicates that I can be 99 percent confident that the true proportion of all queer horror spectators would have answered the question within the named calculated percentage range.

---

<sup>32</sup> The range of confidence intervals is determined by the sample size. The smaller the sample size (n number), the larger the given range will be.

I have a nonprobability sample, as I have well established by now, which uses nonparametric statistical tests (Laurie and Jensen 2016, 315). Nonparametric tests make no assumptions about the underlying form of the distribution or sample size. Previous studies have used chi-square tests to show correlations; however, based on statistical best practices, I am using Spearman's nonparametric statistical procedure to show correlations and the chi-square test for independence that compares two variables to show relationships. The chi-square is a nonparametric statistic frequently used to test for a statistical significance when at least one variable is nominal/qualitative/categorical (i.e. nonnumerical) and indicates whether or not there is a statistically significant relationship between the two variables. If the test indicates statistical significance and that there is a relationship between the two variables, there is likely to be a real pattern in the population. While the chi-square does not give correlations, it calculates and indicates a relationship between the variables via the p-value. The p-value itself indicates the certainty of a relationship and does not indicate the strength of relationship; the strength of relationship is indicated by the Cramér's V for effect size—.1 small effect size, .3 medium effect size, .5 large effect size (Gravetter and Wallnau 2017, 586). In other words, the chi-square statistic value indicates the significance of a relationship, the p-value<sup>33</sup> indicates how likely it is that there is a relationship (whether or not to accept or reject null hypothesis), and Cramér's V indicates the effect size. The null hypothesis is always testing that no relationship exists between the variables. The null hypothesis is only rejected if the statistical result reaches a significance level (the alpha) of unusualness, which I set at .01. If the p-value is higher than .01 the null hypothesis is true and there is no relationship between the variables; if less than .01 the null hypothesis is rejected and a relationship exists between the variables. Stated differently, by setting the statistical significance level at 1 percent, I can be 99 percent certain that the relationship between the two variables did not occur by chance.<sup>34</sup> Chi-square tests are valid only if they contain mutually exclusive data and, as previously discussed, marginalized identities do not always fit into the tidy boxes of mutual exclusivity.<sup>35</sup> The realities of the queer community are prioritized here over the norms of cisheteropatriarchally created data analysis; any categorical demographic data in my research cannot be tested for chi-square statistical significance.

---

<sup>33</sup> The p-value can never be zero.

<sup>34</sup> If the p-value is under .01, results are considered statistically significant. If the p-value is below .005, the results are considered highly statistically significant.

To show correlations between two ordinal variables (variables that are named and ordered such that one position can be considered higher/lower than another), I will use the Spearman rank-order correlation coefficient (symbol is  $r_s$  and pronounced rho). For example, I can test to discover a statistically significant relationship between participants' horror film knowledge and the frequency of reading horror/gothic fiction. The Spearman's correlation, a nonparametric statistical test, measures the strength and direction of a monotonic association between two ranked variables. All Spearman's rho correlations will exist between +1 (a perfect positive monotonic correlation) and -1 (a perfect negative monotonic correlation). A positive correlation exists when the two variables change in the same direction together (increasing or decreasing together) and a negative correlation exists when the two variables change together but in opposite directions (as one increases, the other decreases). Built into the Spearman's rho correlation is the effect size, the  $r$  value. The closer the  $r$  value is to 1 (perfect positive correlation) or to -1 (perfect negative correlation), the stronger the correlation. When the  $r$  value is closer to 0 the correlation is weaker (no monotonic relationship). Effect sizes for  $r$  values, given in absolute values, are as follows: .9 to 1 (almost perfect relationship); .7 to .9 (very strong relationship); .5 to .7 (strong relationship); .3 to .5 (moderate relationship); .1 to .3 (weak relationship); 0.00 to .1 (very weak relationship). Even though I have a large sample size and can be highly confident of the validity of any correlations found, the correlation coefficient does not speak to which variable is causing the other to change—in other words, correlation is not causation.

---

<sup>35</sup> As discussed, none of my demographic data, with the exception of age and highest education level achieved, is mutually exclusive. In other words, overlap exists in all of my demographic data. For example, a woman who selected "lesbian," "gay," and "queer" as her sexual orientation identity markers is counted in the data counts for lesbian, gay, and queer. As a result, at times, I use demographic identity markers as the units of analysis, rather than the individuals. To determine if data, or variables, have an association, I have employed Yule's Q, a measure of association that indicates both the strength and directionality between two variables. A result of 1 or -1 indicates a perfect association.

Additionally, I will be using the independent t-test, a parametric inferential statistical test used to determine if the means of two independent groups are significantly different. Even though the t-test is a parametric test that assumes normal distribution, the central limit theorem states that if there is a sufficiently large sample size, the sampling distribution starts to approximate normal distribution. As I have a large sample size, I can satisfy the normality assumption and, therefore, can employ the t-test to measure the difference between two means. I will use the t-test with Y/N questions compared with an ordinal 1-5 Likert scale question. For example, I will conduct an independent two-sample t-test to compare the mean levels of queers' enjoyment of "camp-y" horror films with whether or not the presence of a queer character affects their enjoyment of a horror film. Once I have the SPSS t-test calculation, Cohen's d is calculated to get the effect size, which indicates the standardized difference between two means (.2 is small, .5 is medium, and .8 is large). The larger the effect size, the more "impressive" or meaningful the standardized difference between the two means (Cohen 1988, 25-26). Again, because of my sizable sample, I can be confident whether a relationship exists and if that relationship is small, medium, or large.

2.12 Instigations for Future Queer Research

As current statistical theory does not incorporate or consider nonnormative embodiment, a "sample should be assessed only in the context of the research questions and inferences it makes, not by any objective measure of sampling sophistication" (Meyer and Wilson 2009, 30). This research is centered on the unique relationship that a population of queers has with the horror genre and the empirical data collected about that relationship via a survey of 4,107 queer horror spectators, a response rate that directly speaks to this distinctive relationship, particularly, considering that "several characteristics of LGB populations make it challenging for sampling" (Meyer and Wilson 2009, 29). Therefore, reaching an even smaller subset of the queer population, those who love horror, is even more challenging. Mathias Clasen encourages further empirical research by stating that the "field of experimental and quantitative horror research is wide open, and only the imagination—and institutional barriers, such as a lack of training and funding opportunities (Carroll 2010)—put a limit to growth in this domain” (2017, 163). This research project adds to the field and empowers others to do the same, to test new research questions about queer horror spectators and further queer research methods. Moreover, the difficulty and frustration a queer researcher experiences when faced with cisheteropatriarchal institutional norms speaks to “the importance of opening up academic processes and discussing reviewing protocols in detail, to explore the internal ‘boundary policing’ that often takes place, yet is often ignored, overlooked or silenced” (Browne and Nash 2010, 8-9). To reiterate, the previous explication of the ethical approval experience ought to be understood as a generalized call to all universities to evaluate the inclusivity and malleability of their current internal human subject review processes, as the current ethics approval process worked against some intentionally queer and inclusive approaches in my humanities research project.<sup>36</sup> Even still, this research process has been professionally fulfilling and personally rewarding, being an opportunity to both delve into valuable research territory and push boundaries. I strongly encourage queer researchers to continue our insertion of non-cisheteropatriarchal methodologies to push and queer the bounds of current normative methods. Furthermore, universities—specifically the humans who shape research such as ethics committees—must reevaluate the norms of humanities-based research that is conducted by and/or with marginalized communities. This boundary pushing and academic reevaluation will further advance mixed-method research projects, projects that will continue to uncover and highlight marginal communities such as queer horror spectators. Having established the methodological parameters for the data design, collection, and analysis of a queer community study, the foundation is set for a coherent understanding of horror’s queer community. The subsequent exposition and initial analysis of this study’s survey data creates the first comprehensive and meaningful profile of horror’s queer spectator.

---

<sup>36</sup> My experience navigating this project through MMU should be understood as an institutional case study, as an example of inadvertent institutional obstructions that compromise and complicate queer research, but not as a complaint against MMU specifically.

Chapter 3

Portrait of a Queer Horror Fan: The Opinions, Habits, and Tastes of the Queer Spectator

Queer people inherently relate to the otherness and subversion of horror (46974402).

I have stopped watching [horror films] with heterosexuals because they do it wrong (47081179).

Heterosexual people think a horror movie MUST be scary and LGBTQ+ appreciate every aspect of it (47752115).

There are parallels of queer survivorship with survival in horror films that cisheterosexual life experiences do not reflect on the axis of a/gender(s) or a/sexuality(ies) (47167830).

I feel that a lot of horror is intrinsically queer as it relies on fear of the otherworldly and outsiders which can be a metaphor for the LGBTQ community (47081984).

Due to having an intrinsically different worldview and lived experience, the way I “read” films is very different from hetero viewers (47079391).

As established in Chapter 1, this study both privileges queer identity over other identity markers and argues that the queer spectator of horror understands their queerness (one aspect of a multiplicitous identity) as the reason they form a distinctive relationship with the horror genre. This chapter, then, centers the expositional presentation and generalized understanding of queer fans of horror in aggregate; presenting and analyzing this large data set in aggregate provides empirical evidence for meaningful assertions about the queer horror spectator and raises questions about a range of largely unsubstantiated claims that horror scholars have made for decades. This chapter, therefore, presents a large amount of aggregate data without complete in-depth analysis because its important purpose is to establish the first comprehensive empirical portrait of the queer spectator of horror film.<sup>1</sup> The chapters that follow, in turn, provide comprehensive explication of a selection of the data findings to more deeply consider the topics of queer trauma, camp, and drag horror hosts. The overall demographics (age, race, gender identity, sexual orientation, and education) of the survey participants are presented here, curtailing in-depth discussions of and distinctions in intersectionality.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Over six thousand aggregate reports, computed from many thousands of possible permutations and combinations, from this survey data are available for future research. Crucial to the ongoing discourse on the queer horror spectator will be future in-depth analyses that examine the effect of gender identity, race, ethnicity, age, educational status, nationality, etc. on the queer relationship to the horror genre.

The process of data presentation is one of selection. Even though the principal aim of this study is to provide insights into the horror-loving queer population as a whole, the chapter will also present select statistically significant correlations and intersectional meanings extrapolated from the data in order to demonstrate how spectatorial subjectivity may alter reactions to the horror genre. Although this study privileges queerness and argues that one's queerness engenders a distinctive relationship with the horror genre, it does not completely ignore Browne and Nash's dictum that "queer methodological approaches must be attentive to issues of intersectionality" (2010, 17). Just as queerness cannot be extricated from one's individual subjectivity, other identity markers cannot be extricated from one's subjective experiences as a queer person. A person's intersectional subjectivity directly relates to their sociopolitical access to safety and power, influencing nearly every facet of their life, since embodied subjectivity alters both how a person sees the world and how the world sees them. According to Janet Staiger, reception studies examines the relationship between "actual spectators and films" (1992, 8). She explicitly states that "each spectator is a complex and contradictory construction of such self-identities as gender, sexual preference, class, race, and ethnicity" (Staiger 1992, 13). The thousands of diverse queer spectators of horror film that inform this study collectively demonstrate that one's queerness is the identity marker which becomes salient when analyzing one's relationship to the horror genre. Because this research project is the first foundational empirical study of queer horror spectators, priority has been given to presenting the aggregate data results centered on queerness. From this survey data, as discussed in Chapter 2, extrapolation calculations approximate how the total population of queer horror spectators would have answered the questions, which is done by calculating confidence intervals for the population proportion. In other words, this data can indicate with 99 percent confidence the opinions, habits, and tastes of all queer spectators of horror, not just those who responded to the survey. Brigid Cherry found when extricating the female horror fan from obscurity that “the male audience model [was] concealing an unrecognized female audience” (1999, 10). Likewise, the presumed cisheterosexual audience model has hitherto concealed the queer horror spectator. This study’s empirical data emphatically evidences that queer spectators of horror film connect to the genre differently than cisheterosexual horror fans because the queer horror relationship is grounded in a nonnormative embodiment, and proves that the connection queers have to horror transcends national borders, generations, and intersectional subjectivities.

---

<sup>2</sup> Fundamental to this study's argument that queer spectators distinctively connect with the horror genre is the understanding that this queer-horror connection is fostered in idiosyncratic ways and via myriad films. While the survey data demonstrates pronounced consensus in the overall opinions, habits, and tastes of the queer spectator, the mixed-method data simultaneously reveals the diversity of and nuances in individual relationships with and interpretations of horror film, as reported by the research participants.

3.1 Queer Heterogeneity and Consensus

Queer spectators of horror film come from different countries, cultures, ages, races, ethnicities, genders, sexualities, educational levels, and relationship statuses, yet the data substantiates impressive agreement in their opinions, habits, and tastes as a queer community. Harry Benshoff and Sean Griffin write about how a diverse group of individuals can become a connected and aligned community, to understand themselves as a queer community:

Coming out meant becoming adept at reading queer subtexts, being able to bend straight culture (in film as well as the rest of the material world) into something new, and learning the often clandestine and coded practices of the era’s queer subcultures. The sense of kinship created through such shared activity helped queer people begin to conceptualize themselves as both a community and a culture (2006, 68).

In other words, queerness functions as a shared textual and subtextual language, a language not understood (certainly not fluently) by members from other communities to which queers belong. This queer language is developed outside the mainstream, often outside the childhood home, school, and neighborhood, outside physical borders and boundaries; this language often comes from pop culture encoding and references in media such as film.<sup>3</sup>

Understanding this queer(ed) common language provides an analytic framework to develop and delineate the distinctive relationship that queer spectators have with the horror genre. Detailing the diversity of the demographic profile of the survey participants and narrators, while emphasizing the overwhelming consensus in the data results, further elucidates queer spectators' distinctive love of horror. The demographic composition—age, race/ethnicity, gender identity, and sexual orientation—of the survey participants and oral history narrators demonstrates a “typological representativeness,” which results, with ample responses across all demographic categories, in being “able to describe with confidence their patterned similarities and differences” (Barker, Mathijs, and Trobia 2008, 223; italics in the original). This study's survey participants, indeed, cross ages, races, ethnicities, gender identities, sexual orientations, and nations. Since previous quantitative studies about the horror genre do not detail the racial and/or ethnic composition of their research participants, this study also then stands as the most racially and ethnically diverse empirical horror study to date. The survey participants live in the United States ( $n = 2,829$ );<sup>4</sup> the United Kingdom, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand ( $n = 897$ ); or elsewhere in the world ( $n = 375$ ),<sup>5</sup> thereby generating “cross-country and therefore cross-cultural” data (Barker et al. 2008, 7; italics in the original). This cross-cultural data importantly evidences that the 4,107 differently embodied queer subjectivities collected demonstrate greater consensus than difference. The comprehensive mixed-method data results remain unwavering: the shared and distinctive relationship with the horror genre amongst queers crosses intersectional embodiment. The oral history narrators, whilst from varied intersectional backgrounds, deeply reflect this shared narrative—a through-line that speaks directly to the distinctive relationship that queers have with the horror genre. “A common thread in much ‘new audience research’ is a recognition that audience engagements are deeply interwoven with wider cultural membership” (Barker, Mathijs, and Trobia 2008, 216). In this study, queerness is the cultural membership that foregrounds the participants' and narrators' distinctive relationship to horror. The following presentation of demographic data will evidence the heterogeneity of the queer horror spectator.

---

<sup>3</sup> For example, popular queer performers, from Lady Gaga to Lil Nas X, have introduced new generations to camp performance, while queer films, such as The Rocky Horror Picture Show (1975), Paris Is Burning (1990), and Portrait of a Lady on Fire (2019), continue to influence queer culture today.

---

<sup>4</sup> Of the 2,829 survey participants from the United States, 2,783 (98.4 percent) were born in the US while 36 (1.3 percent) emigrated to the US.

<sup>5</sup> The survey asked “Do you currently live in the United States?” If the participant selected “No,” they received a subsequent question that asked “Do you currently live in the United Kingdom, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand?” If they selected “No” there was no further follow-up question nor open text box. Therefore, the country of residence is not known for 375 of the survey participants.

Understanding who the queer spectator is demographically precedes the subsequent detailing of their opinions, habits, and tastes of the horror genre.

3.2 Demographics of Queer Spectators of Horror Film

3.2.1 Gender and Sexual Orientation Diversity of Queer Spectators

The multitude of gender identities<sup>6</sup> and sexual orientations represented by this substantial queer community, and the demonstrated ardent fandom of these queers, confirms that prior empirical research into horror audiences has both advertently and inadvertently rendered the queer spectator invisible through cisheteronormative methodologies and methods. Heretofore, when scholars in horror studies have theoretically centered queerness, they have predominantly analyzed the textual metaphor of queerness as monstrous and monstrosity as queer (Benshoff 1997; Miller 2011; Scahill 2015). Moreover, the focus to date on queerness in horror or queer horror spectators privileges cisgender men (Scales 2015; Elliott-Smith 2016). A review of the gender identity of this survey's participants quickly ends the privileging of white cis gay men and establishes a comprehensive picture of the queer horror spectator, a portrait in which the queer demographic is comprised of cis women, trans women, cis men, trans men, and transsexual, genderqueer, agender, non-binary people, as well as other gender identities written in by 120 participants (including genderfluid, two spirit, demimale, transmasculine, bigender, questioning, butch, pangender, androgynous, femme, gender non-conforming, and gender neutral).<sup>7</sup> Given the survey's significant sample size, the nearly equal representation of women and men is quite remarkable, with 32.8 percent ( $n = 1,341$ ) of the survey participants identifying as cisgender women and 29.5 percent ( $n = 1,207$ ) of the survey participants identifying as cisgender men (see figure 3.1).<sup>8</sup> This balance

---

<sup>6</sup> Historically (and sometimes presently), biological sex and identificatory gender are conflated and mistakingly presumed as one, leading previous (and current) academic studies, therefore, to subsume sex and gender. Previous horror research that made conclusions based on the subsumed categories of "males" and "females" can be compared with the gender identity categories used currently in queer communities and, thus, in this study. This study does not seek to reconcile the previous conflation of sex and gender, but instead to acknowledge the needed disentanglement between sex and gender and to honor the gender expression and identity of all participants and narrators.

<sup>7</sup> Susan Stryker notes that "a conservative estimate as of 2016 is that roughly 1.7 percent of contemporary youth identify as trans or gender-nonconforming, that is, more than three times the figures for adults" (2017, 198).

<sup>8</sup> In comparison, Alexander Dhoest and Nele Simons in "Questioning Queer Audiences: Exploring Diversity in Lesbian and Gay Men's Media Uses and Readings," declare that their becomes even more pronounced when including all women respondents (cis, trans, and genderqueer women) since the participant percentage increases to 43.5 percent, which is higher than the 42.3 percent men (including cis, trans, and genderqueer men). This gender-balanced representation stands in direct opposition and as a significant refutation to previous assumptions about the horror spectator—both heterosexual and queer. Even with Berenstein’s and Cherry’s research evincing the female horror fan, the overall emphasis of previous empirical studies continued to reinforce presumed gender imbalances in and gendered consumptions of the genre.

Please indicate your current gender identity: select all that apply

FIGURE 3.1. Bar graph of survey participants’ gender identities. Note: this category was not mutually exclusive; therefore, participants could select more than one gender identity marker to align with their own identity.

This gendered reinforcement functioned, for one, to subsume the queer woman. For example, Stephen Follows states that the “UK cinema audience for horror movies is 57% male and 43% female” (2017, 120)<sup>9</sup> and even Cherry’s own preliminary horror audience survey reports a similar gender split based on 11 horror screenings, resulting in a 68 percent male ( $n = 446$ ) and 32 percent ( $n = 212$ ) female audience makeup (1999, 234). Cherry suggests the reason for this binaristic gender divide when she states that “social pressures, in addition to the fact that it is considered unfeminine for women to like horror films, make it likely that many women would not willingly admit to a taste for horror” (2002, 44); however, this study’s survey participant results demonstrate that queer cis, trans, and genderqueer women are more than willing to stake their claim on horror. Furthermore, a review of the transcripts from this project’s women narrators evidences that queer women seem to have no concerns that horror is considered an “unfeminine” genre and are not self-conscious in these proclivities.<sup>10</sup> Strengthening this assertion about the queer horror spectator, the findings in Thomas Austin’s audience study of Bram Stoker’s Dracula (1992) rejected a “simple and clear-cut gendered division” in horror audiences (2002, 137). This determination is further bolstered by Cherry’s research findings on the female horror film audience (1999) and Richard Nowell’s investigation into the North American film production and distribution companies, which understood that “female youth [have] held the key to commercially viable horror” as far back as the 1970s (2011, 128). Daniel Humphrey, elaborating on the reporting of Christine Spines, unequivocally notes “that women attend horror films more than men—at least in the theaters and at least on opening weekends” (2014, 53). Women who love horror thus have had their place cemented in horror studies, despite queer women incontrovertibly being collapsed into the data about women horror spectators—until now. Women (including queer women) have always been a part of horror fandom and this study demonstrates that queers from myriad backgrounds and embodiments—not only white cis gay men—love the horror genre.

“sample was quite balanced in terms of gender (57 percent male, 43 percent female)” (2012, 266).

<sup>9</sup> The Horror Report by data researcher Stephen Follows states that the “principal research tool was a database of every horror feature film released in cinemas between 1st January 1996 and 31st December 2016” (2017, 203).

As established, then, queer horror spectators reflect a full and robust gender spectrum and, correspondingly, represent myriad sexual orientations. While survey participants most selected the questionnaire options “bisexual” ( $n = 1,427$ ), “gay” ( $n = 1,290$ ), “queer” ( $n = 1,252$ ), “pansexual” ( $n = 854$ ), and “lesbian” ( $n = 595$ ),<sup>11</sup> 111 survey participants took the time to add their not-listed sexual orientation (thereby creating a more comprehensive understanding of nuanced or lesser-known sexual orientations), including: “demisexual”,

---

<sup>10</sup> The women narrators did not speak of their love of horror in relation to constructed notions of gendered behaviors and expectations.

<sup>11</sup> Of the 4,107 survey participants who reported their sexual orientation(s), only .004 (four thousandths) percent report that they are heterosexual. All 28 of those who identify as heterosexual also report that they are transgender, further evidencing the queerness of all survey participants.

“biromantic”, “homoromantic”, “aceflux”, “teratophile”, “dyke”, “panromantic”, “demipolysexual”, “aromantic”, “greysexual”, “omnisexual”, “sadist”, and “fictionsexual” (see figure 3.2). The wide spectrum of survey participants’ sexual orientations underscores the complexity, fluidity, and variety of queer subjectivity.

Please indicate your current sexual orientation: select all that apply

FIGURE 3.2. Bar graph of survey participants’ sexual orientations. Note: this category was not mutually exclusive; therefore, participants could select more than one sexual orientation per their own identification.

3.2.2 Racial/Ethnic Identifications

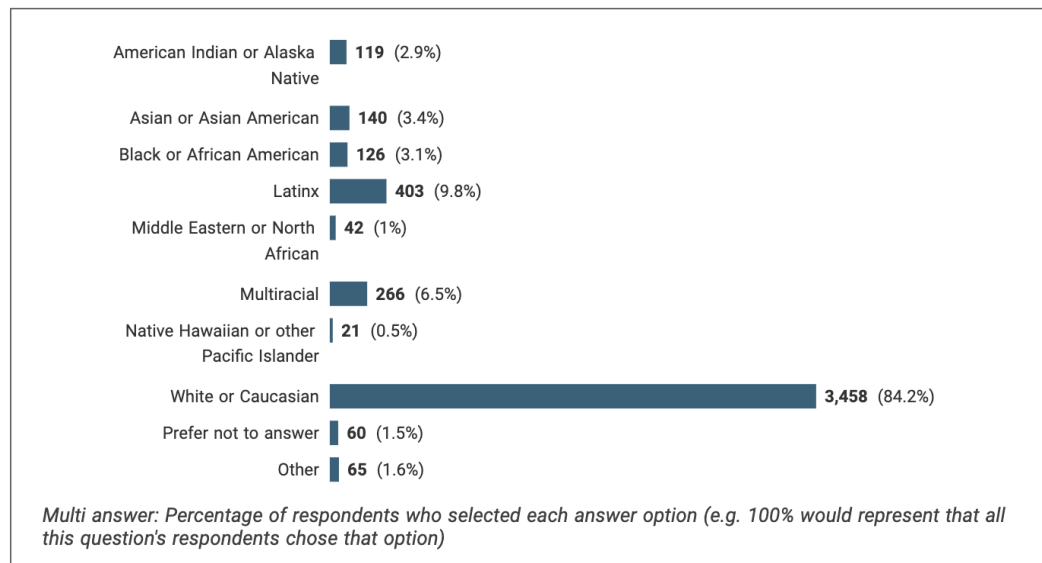

FIGURE 3.3. Bar graph of survey participants’ racial and/or ethnic identities. Note: this category was not mutually exclusive; therefore, participants could select more than one race or ethnicity per their own racial and ethnic composition.

Since this study stands as the most racially and ethnically diverse empirical horror study to date, detailing the race/ethnicity of the survey participants underscores the diversity of the queer horror fan population. The survey participants' racial and ethnic composition is as follows (see figure 3.3):<sup>12</sup> 2.9 percent American Indian or Alaska Native ( $n = 119$ ), 3.4 percent Asian or Asian American ( $n = 140$ ), 3.1 percent Black or African American ( $n = 126$ ), 9.8 percent Latinx ( $n = 403$ ), 1 percent Middle Eastern or North African ( $n = 42$ ), 6.5 percent Multiracial ( $n = 266$ ), .5 percent Native Hawaiian or other Pacific Islander ( $n = 21$ ), and/or 84.2 percent White or Caucasian ( $n = 3,458$ ).<sup>13</sup>

	United States	UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand	Elsewhere in the world
American Indian or Alaska Native	101	17	0	118
Asian or Asian American	91	23	26	140
Black or African American	116	7	3	126
Latinx	329	13	60	402
Middle Eastern or North African	26	6	10	42
Multiracial	187	50	28	265
Native Hawaiian or other Pacific Islander	17	2	2	21
White or Caucasian	2,369	817	266	3,452

FIGURE 3.4. Chart that exhibits the number of survey participants from the United States; the United Kingdom, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand; or elsewhere in the world by racial and/or ethnic identities.

The demographic section of the survey opened with the following statement: “Collecting demographic data for a diverse community can unintentionally leave some persons feeling unrepresented or unseen. With inclusivity as a goal, <sup>12</sup> Since the survey allowed participants to multi-select on the race/ethnicity, gender identity, and sexual orientation questions, the hard counts presented here represent the number of participants who selected that identity marker. For example, a survey participant may have selected “Asian or Asian American,” “White or Caucasian,” and “Multiracial”—thereby appearing in the counts for all three. This methodology has been explained in Chapter 2.

<sup>13</sup> For comparison, the Census Bureau’s Population Estimates Program on July 1, 2019 reported the US “Race and Hispanic Origin” as follows: White alone (76.3 percent), Black or African American alone (13.4 percent), American Indian and Alaska Native alone (1.3 percent), Asian alone (5.9 percent), Native Hawaiian and other Pacific Islander alone (.2 percent), Hispanic or Latino (18.5 percent), and Two or More Races (2.8 percent). The Office for National Statistics, the executive office of the UK Statistics Authority, reports in the 2011 census that 86 percent of the UK population was white, 2.5 percent was Indian, and 2 percent was Pakistani (see figure 3.4).

nearly every question provides an open entry box if the best answer for you has not been provided.” Multiple survey participants expanded the demographic data by writing in additional races/ethnicities such as: Ashkenazi/Jewish, Romani/Traveller, Aboriginal Australian, and British Indian.<sup>14</sup> 89.5 percent of the survey participants selected one race/ethnicity, 7 percent selected two races/ethnicities, 3.2 percent selected three races/ethnicities, and .3 percent selected more than three races/ethnicities.

3.2.3 Educational Attainment and Age

➔ Frequencies

Statistics
Please indicate your highest level of education completed:
N	Valid	4104
	Missing	3
Please indicate your highest level of education completed:
		Frequency	Percent	Valid Percent	Cumulative Percent
Valid	Some high school	89	2.2	2.2	2.2
	High school diploma or GED	469	11.4	11.4	13.6
	Some college or training	950	23.1	23.1	36.7
	Trade, technical or vocational training	141	3.4	3.4	40.2
	Associate's degree	276	6.7	6.7	46.9
	Bachelor's degree	1452	35.4	35.4	82.3
	Master's degree	539	13.1	13.1	95.4
	Doctorate and/or other Professional degree	154	3.7	3.8	99.2
	Other	34	.8	.8	100.0
	Total	4104	99.9	100.0
Missing	System	3	.1
Total		4107	100.0

FIGURE 3.5. Frequency chart that indicates the highest level of education completed by survey participants.

Given the denigrated and “lowbrow” status historically conferred upon the horror genre,<sup>15</sup> the education levels achieved by horror fans merit observation because queer spectators disprove the fallacious assumptions commonly made about horror audiences being less educated (see figure 3.5). Cherry documents that female horror fans “appear to be well-educated [sic] or trained for a career. 54 per cent [sic] have university or college degrees, 10 per cent [sic] of these having post-graduate degree or diploma qualifications” (1999, 79).

<sup>14</sup> Further responses could provide insights into countries/regions of residence or origin, such as: Filipino, Finnish, Slav, Armenian and Russian, Portuguese, Polish, Hungarian, Spanish, South African Indian (Indian, born in South Africa), Greek Turkish, Mediterranean/Sicilian, Métis, Afghan, Mauritian, Mayan, Argentinian, and Greek-German.

<sup>15</sup> Horror data researcher Stephen Follows analyzed IMDB and Metascore ratings and determined that horror is the “lowest regarded genre.” Follows’s data analysis evidences that “horror has been the worst reviewed genre amongst all movies with relative consistency,” and “that both critics and audiences view horror less favourably than any other genre” (2017, 113).

Correspondingly, queer horror fans are a highly educated population, with 59 percent having obtained university/college degrees and 16.9 percent of these being postgraduate degrees. While people under the age of 30 comprise the largest segment of the survey participants ( $n = 2,332$ ), 43.1 percent of the participants are over 30 ( $n = 1,767$ ) (see figure 3.6).<sup>16</sup> This age skewing is likely informed by the survey sample-sourcing methods. In “Sampling Lesbian, Gay, and Bisexual Populations,” Ilan H. Meyer and Patrick A. Wilson explain that “in the general population, a digital divide exists: Americans with Internet access are younger, have a higher socioeconomic status, and are less likely to be racial/ethnic minorities than those without Internet access” (2009, 29).

Inarguably, the employment of an online survey and the use of Instagram as the main social media marketing platform will privilege responses from respondents who skew young, white, and educated. Cherry’s female horror fan and this study’s queer horror fan both reach educational attainment at levels beyond respective national averages, yet previous studies emphasize that horror fans come from less advantaged socioeconomic groups. “Using exit polls of UK cinema audiences,” Stephen Follows and Bruce Nash state, “we can see that horror movies are disproportionately enjoyed by people on the lower end of the class spectrum when compared to all other genres” (2018, n.p.). While those authors do not explicate in the report their reason for emphasizing or pointing out the class distinction in horror fans, an unspoken implication is that horror is more often consumed by an undiscerning audience, which may say more about critical views of class than horror audiences. This study did not collect employment data; however, occupation is not the only vector of class position, which can be surmised by educational attainment. The majority of survey participants obtained college, undergraduate, and/or postgraduate degrees across the US (59.7 percent) and the UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New

---

Additionally, David Church’s Post-Horror: Art, Genre and Cultural Elevation summary statement reads: “Horror cinema has long been a popular but culturally denigrated genre” (2021, n.p.).

<sup>16</sup> 89.7 percent of survey participants are under 42.

Zealand (61.4 percent). That rate of educational attainment for queer horror fans is particularly significant when compared to the total percentages of the US and the UK populations who hold a bachelor’s degree or higher, which are 36 percent and 42 percent respectively (2020 US Census and 2017 Office for National Statistics). In direct contrast to the Follows report, which states that 78.6 percent of the UK cinema-going horror audience are “Lower Middle Class,” “Skilled Working Class,” “Working Class,” or “Non-working” (2017, 123), this study’s data on education levels further indicates that queer horror fans exist outside mainstream norms and expand the boundaries of previously studied cinema-going horror audiences. In all, this study’s demographic data evidences that the queer horror spectator exists across all genders, sexual orientations, races, ethnicities, educational backgrounds, and ages. With the full demographic understanding of the queer horror spectator, the data then clearly reveals how—and allows us to understand how and why—queer identity finds an embodied and intellectualized commonality in the status of Other as represented in horror film.

➔ Frequencies

Statistics
What is your current age?
N	Valid	4099
	Missing	8

What is your current age?
		Frequency	Percent	Valid Percent	Cumulative Percent
Valid	18–23 years old	1006	24.5	24.5	24.5
	24–29 years old	1326	32.3	32.3	56.9
	30–35 years old	829	20.2	20.2	77.1
	36–41 years old	523	12.7	12.8	89.9
	42–47 years old	233	5.7	5.7	95.6
	48–53 years old	115	2.8	2.8	98.4
	54–59 years old	56	1.4	1.4	99.7
	60–65 years old	8	.2	.2	99.9
	66+ years old	3	.1	.1	100.0
	Total	4099	99.8	100.0
Missing	System	8	.2
	Total	4107	100.0

FIGURE 3.6. Frequency chart that shows the age of survey participants at the time of completing the survey.

3.3 The Othered Lens of Queerness

The queer horror spectator should be understood to be conscious and critical about how their queerness affects their consumption of cultural texts, as learned through statistical inference from this study's survey data. When asked if they, as members of the LGBTQ+ community, have a different reaction to horror films as compared with heterosexual viewers, the majority of survey participants report that they react differently to horror than heterosexuals. In fact, 57.1 percent ( $n = 2,339$ ), a majority of survey participants, think that their queerness alters how they react to the horror genre. The 99 percent confidence interval indicates that the actual percentage of queer spectators who would have answered that they have different reaction to horror films as compared with heterosexual viewers in the total horror-loving queer population runs from 55.1 percent to 59.1 percent. This indicates with 99 percent confidence that a majority 55.1 percent to 59.1 percent of all queer horror spectators would report they have a different reaction to horror films as compared with heterosexual viewers.

Similarly, when survey participants were asked if they felt that being queer influences their taste in horror films, a 55.9 percent ( $n = 2,290$ ) majority report that their queerness alters their horror tastes. The 99 percent confidence interval indicates that the actual percentage who would have answered that their queerness affects their tastes in horror films in the total horror-loving queer population runs from 53.9 percent to 57.9 percent. This further highlights that the majority of queer horror spectators report that their queerness is integral to their relationship with the horror genre. That belief is also found represented in early queer scholars, such as Vito Russo and Alexander Doty, who analyzed film through the queer lens, deconstructing film texts to illustrate how "lesbians, gay men, and other queers experience films differently than do straight viewers" (Benshoff and Griffin 2006, 10). In response to being asked to explain why they think that they have a different reaction to horror films as compared with heterosexual viewers, one participant succinctly summed up the views of many when they wrote: "Identity is a lens" (47742033). In other words, the majority of queer people understand their queer identity is a part of how they see and understand the world.

These two survey questions that captured data on how the participants think their queerness directly relates to the horror genre explicitly asked: “As a member of the LGBTQ+ community, do you feel that you have a different reaction to horror films as compared with heterosexual viewers?” and “Do you feel that being queer influences your taste in horror films?” While there is comprehensive consensus amongst queers in the survey’s data results, queer subjectivity (a queer person’s gender, race/ethnicity, class, age, nationality, and educational attainment), at times, indicates nuanced intersectional responses to horror, as underscored by examining the statistical results for a two-variable measure of association, the Yule’s Q. For the majority of queer horror fans who report they have different reactions to horror film as compared with heterosexual viewers, the Yule’s Q demonstrates no or negligible association when examining cis women compared with cis men (Yule’s Q .02); US participants compared with non-US participants (Yule’s Q .13); and white participants compared with BIPOC participants (Yule’s Q .00). Whereas there is a very small association between participants under 42 compared to participants that are 42 and older (Yule’s Q .28), with those under 42 more often stating that their queerness gives them a different reaction to horror. Moreover, cisgender participants compared to trans* participants demonstrate a moderate association (Yule’s Q .39). Trans* participants more often report that their queerness gives them a different reaction to horror. Comparably, Yule’s Qs examining whether participants think that their queerness influences their taste in horror demonstrate no or negligible association when examining cis women compared to cis men (Yule’s Q .01); US participants compared to non-US participants (Yule’s Q .08); and white participants compared to BIPOC participants (Yule’s Q .04). There is a very small association between participants under 42 compared to participants that are 42 and older (Yule’s Q .20) and participants with a university/college degree compared to participants without one (Yule’s Q .19). This demonstrates that younger and degree-holding participants more often report that their queerness influences their taste in horror. Cisgender participants, when compared to trans* participants, demonstrate a moderate association (Yule’s Q .31), indicating again that trans* participants more often report that their queerness influences their taste in horror.

The more educated the queer horror fan is, the more likely they are to report that their queerness affects their opinions, habits, and tastes of the horror genre. The data reveals a small but highly statistically significant relationship between a queer person's highest level of education completed and answering that their queerness creates a different reaction or taste in horror films ("different reaction"  $\chi^2(8) = 37.731, p < .000$ , Cramér's  $V = .10, n = 4,096$  and queer "taste"  $\chi^2(8) = 76.145, p < .000$ , Cramér's  $V = .14, n = 4,092$ ). Moreover, the older the survey participant is, the less likely they are to report that their queerness affects their opinions, habits, and tastes of the horror genre. A highly statistically significant but small relationship also exists between a queer person's age and answering that their queerness creates a different reaction or taste in horror films ("different reaction"  $\chi^2(6) = 45.696, p < .000$ , Cramér's  $V = .11, n = 4,080$  and queer "taste"  $\chi^2(6) = 43.118, p < .000$ , Cramér's  $V = .10, n = 4,077$ ). Age and educational level having statistically significant relationships with a queer person's understanding of their queerness underscores how queer subjectivity always already exists in a sociopolitical context.

Nonetheless, this entire study analytically and purposefully privileges queerness over other identity markers, not because there is little to be learned from analyzing the different intersectional embodiments of the queer community, but because one's queerness creates a different othering in the world, a different lens that warrants examination. As Audre Lorde states:

Within the lesbian community I am Black, and within the Black community I am a lesbian. Any attack against Black people is a lesbian and gay issue, because I and thousands of other Black women are part of the lesbian community. Any attack against lesbians and gays is a Black issue, because thousands of lesbians and gay men are Black. There is no hierarchy of oppression (1983, 9).

In this statement, Lorde concisely delineates how one's identity markers cannot be disentangled and detached. Just as there is no hierarchy of oppression, similarly, there is no hierarchy of identity. Queers embody their queerness in innumerable idiosyncratic ways—ways that are intrinsically and inherently tied to race, gender, ethnicity, class, and ability. Queer otherness is salient alongside intersectionality and its salience is in part predicated on potential rejection from a queer person's other communities. For example, narrator Mark Estes discusses how being a Black gay man functions to isolate him from members of his Black community and being Black in white supremacist social structures exposes him to racist persecution: "Being Black men, we're targeted. Being a Black gay man, you're targeted not only by the world, but by your brethren" (2020, 12). Similarly, narrator Lana Contreras explains her experience of this intersectionality:

Simply the fear of being ostracized—the fear of being culturally Catholic and it [homosexuality] being this instilled sin. . . . And it's not because of a fear of religion, it's fear of being shunned by my family. It's the fear of being shunned. The fact that I financially help my family and I think that they would not accept my money and they would be destitute and they would lose their home. Not pay their bills because they don't want to take fucking money from this dyke. That is the fear I have (2020, 11).

Estes's and Contreras's experiences underscore how the queer lens can be formed outside of familial, racial, and/or ethnic communities—how the queer lens is forged in one's otherness from all other social units. The following selection of responses from survey participants, who are various gender and sexual identity combinations (including cisgender, transgender, genderqueer, non-binary, gay, lesbian, bisexual, and pansexual), accentuates this point:

I often feel that the themes of 'otherness' and alienation (either from the monster side or the protagonist side) appeal to me in a different way than for a straight audience (46894279).

I think I'm more in tune to the idea of The Other in films and how we use othering to get to fears we can't name (46811770).

Queerness gives a unique perspective of what it means to be different (46825875).

I think that being far more of an Other than most heterosexual (white and cis) viewers means that I tend to have horror resonate in a deeper and more unique way, as it's akin to what I and other LGBTQ+ people experience (47082671).

I think the sense of isolation and fear on the part of the monster is more understood by an LGBT audience (46914100).

I think I 'read' horror films (and all art) with a different lens on it, often critiquing it where a heterosexual viewer would accept it or enjoying stories or characters that they would not appreciate or understand (46764770).

I think I find more truth in horror films than heterosexual viewers. I think heterosexual viewers sometimes see horror films as a thrilling fantasy whereas, in my experience as a queer person, I find their ruthless depictions of violence and sex and bodies as being reflective of my lived experiences (47082733).

Different experience of the world gives you a different lens on film (47645409).

Heterosexual people can't understand what it's like to be victimised or understand what it's like to love as an LGBTQ person. They don't know what it's like being on the journey of uncovering yourself. Those things have an effect on how people view the world and themselves and it changes how I relate to movies and understand characters (47724006).

I always think through a queer lens (48157393).

I feel that generally in life my sexuality has an impact on my reading of the world around me and particularly of films and literature (47034871).

Otherness is an essential part of my human experience, and so the Otherness of a monster's experience, for example, has different meaning for me than it would for someone who would be watching with the lens of heteronormative life experience (48122378).

This othered lens expressed by many survey participants—a lens of queer identity and experience—is an anchor for the distinctive relationship that queers have with the horror genre. While 42.9 percent of survey participants do not perceive that their queerness comparatively alters their reaction to horror films, this does not mean that their relationship to horror films is not actually altered or distinct.<sup>17</sup> In other words, a person's queerness still shapes how they process and enjoy horror films, even if they might not understand their queerness to do so or be fully aware of their queerness as part of their understanding of self. It is imperative to emphasize that this question and the subsequent question, about queerness influencing taste in horror films, are both investigating the queer lens and serve to document whether or not survey participants perceive or understand their queer lens, not whether or not their queer lens exists. Stated differently, this study's data documents that the majority of queer spectators are aware of their distinct relationship to horror; even still, this data point is one of many that work together to evidence the sui generis relationship queer spectators have with the horror genre. Even though all queers exist in opposition to the normative, a person's intersectionality entirely affects their individual subjectivity and their understanding or awareness of their subjectivity. As Andrew Gorman-Murray, Lynda Johnston, and Gordon Waitt state: "One challenge in queer academic scholarship is the difficulty in effectively communicating and achieving understanding across an increasingly wide range of sexual subjects, each with their own experiences, practices, relationships and subjectivities" (2010, 99). The 4,107 survey participants and 15 oral history narrators represent the same number of individual queer subjectivities. Despite this, all survey questions that center queerness and queer representation demonstrate a critical consensus. For instance, 76.8 percent ( $n = 3,150$ ) of survey participants report that the presence of a queer character affects their enjoyment of a horror film.<sup>18</sup> In fact, 2,989 survey participants elected to further explain in what ways the presence of a queer character affects their enjoyment of a horror film. These selected written responses center reasons such as the sparsity of explicit queer characters in horror, the importance of positive queer representation, and the connection between queerness, the queer experience, and the horror genre:

---

<sup>17</sup> With the notable number of survey participants who report that their queerness does not alter their reaction to or taste in horror films, 42.9 and 44.1 percent respectively, there are generational, gender, relationship, and educational differences between the queer spectators who understand and report a queer lens and those who do not; queer spectators who are 48 and older, cisgender, in monogamous relationships, and non degree-holding are more likely to state that their queerness does not alter their reaction to or taste in horror films. These statistical findings suggest the need for further research on the effects that age, assimilative homonormativity, and exposure to queer theory have on one's perception of their queer relationship to the horror genre (and the queer lens on media in general). Nevertheless, the mixed-method data of this study on queer horror spectators evidences a cohesive consensus, demonstrating that the majority of queer horror spectators recognize and report that their queerness alters their relationship to the horror genre.

If they're treated well (no tropes, no excess abuse, no bad coding, no bury your gays), I appreciate that. I would love love love love more queer presence in horror films (47085220).

If the character is heroic and lives, it makes me feel like I can survive horrible things and reminds me that I have. If the character is heroic and dies, it makes me feel mournful and fatalistic. If the character is maligned and lives, it makes me question the purpose of their character. If a character is maligned and dies, it makes me feel alienated and conflicted about celebrating their demise (46828663).

Just generally happy any time there's queer rep on film. Positive representation is great, and demonized/bad queers give me weird good complicated feelings (46896188).

---

<sup>18</sup> Using the normal approximation of the binomial distribution, the 99 percent confidence interval indicates that the percentage in the total horror-loving queer population who feel that the presence of a queer character affects their enjoyment of a horror film ranges from 75.1 to 78.5 percent.

Visibility is so important it's why we need more queer narratives in horror as well as queer people making those stories (47001060).

LGBTQ viewers have an innately different perspective than the heterosexual viewer. We're still demonized in larger society, viewed by pop culture as something to be viewed, consumed, or exploited. We are the monster and the monsters are always for us if we claim them as our own. This perspective is entirely unique to the queer viewer (47082922).

I am interested in the representation of queer characters and themes in all gothic fiction (inclusive of horror). If a queer character is featured, especially if they feature as more than a peripheral figure or a plot device, I will generally enjoy the film more (47060348).

To see representation of a queer character in horror connects me to horror, because I'm able to see people like me or people within my community on screen and in these films. It feels good. Even if the representation has often times been flawed or problematic, I'm still drawn to the film and can enjoy it (47075790).

As a queer horror fan, I enjoy seeing queer representation in my favorite genre (including queer villains, whom I think are still very important) (47077323).

Queer identity is transgressive and transformative, and having an outlet and metaphor through fiction to explore that is healthy. Monster characters are a passion of mine, even when they're just played straight as evil monsters without any pathos or nuance. When they're sympathetic, sometimes it's hit and miss, sometimes it's great. Queer horror in that context for me often explores the horror of being the monster and wanting to just exist without having to hurt anyone, but still often wanting a sense of revenge or power over one's situation (47112447).

We're faced with real horror daily so I buy queers as heroes in extreme scenarios (47140189).

Representation! I love seeing people outside of the cisgender heterosexual norm in horror. And hopefully some that aren't dying (as much! it is horror afterall) because of the Bury Your Gays trope (47075473).

It is just nice when a horror film acknowledges that it doesn't exist in a purely heterosexual world (47336309).

Horror movies have always presented a space for allegorical dialogues about the Other, and provided that it's handled well I think we as queer people can find a lot to appreciate about working through our cultural struggles through the lens of horror media. . . . We deserve to see ourselves as survivors (47597139).

It's just nice to feel seen. Horror is maligned as the gutter of genre, but its place in the shadows means things can prosper there that couldn't elsewhere. So even if the queer representation in horror is 'bad,' like in SLEEPAWAY CAMP or SILENCE OF THE LAMBS, it's at least THERE, and I don't think it's worse than the navel-gazing, forlorn mirror shots of genitals that seem to dominate modern 'serious' trans films (by cis filmmakers). At the very least in horror films, it gives me something to think about (47708748).

Since most horror is queer coded anyway, I prefer horror with strong queer characters (47747740).

Horror provides a fantastic milieu in which to explore the queer gaze/queerness generally! As a genre, it relies on the manipulation, exploration, subversion of existing societal narratives (especially regarding gender and sex)—it goes hand-in-glove with queer explorations of those topics (47754738).

I think there is a sense of hyper vigilance or heightened sense of danger that many queer people experience as a result of living in heterocentric/heterosexist culture as well as a sense of 'otherness' and exclusion that gives me a stronger relationship to both victims and sympathetic villains that, say, an average heterosexual cis male viewer would (47083609).

Numerous survey participants noted that they have never seen an explicitly queer character in a horror film and, not surprisingly, almost all queer horror fans, 95.1 percent ( $n = 3,898$ ), agree that queers are under-represented in the horror genre. The 99 percent confidence interval indicates that the actual percentage in the total queer population that would have answered that queers are under-represented in the horror genre ranges from 94.3 percent to 96 percent. "How we are seen," Richard Dyer states, "determines in part how we are treated; how we treat others is based on how we see them; such seeing comes from representation" (1993, 1). Queer horror spectators want to see themselves positively represented in horror film in meaningful ways since they so distinctly connect to the genre. Regardless of the desire for more explicit queer representation in horror film, generations of queers have created identification within its existing tropes and characters.

3.4 Monsters, Victims, and the Final Girl

FIGURE 3.7. Bar graph that exhibits with whom survey participants identify in horror films.

Collectively, the survey participant responses underscore the importance of narrative context and metaphorical meanings in the depiction of the “monster,” demonstrating an active engagement with horror film that is directly related to the queer embodied experience. In other words, queer spectators identify with horror film monsters when they feel it represents their own experience. As widely established and theorized, cisheteronormative society both victimizes queers and renders them monstrous (Weiss 1990; Halberstam 1993; Benshoff 1997; Doty 2000; Skal 2001; Miller 2012; Westengard 2019, etc.). Affirming this dual victimization and monstrosity, Sam J. Miller states: “For myself and many other LGBT viewers, the queer monster not only provides an opportunity to identify with someone on-screen, it also allows us to vicariously live out our rage against a social order that oppresses us” (2011, 221). Survey results evidence that 77.3 percent ( $n = 3,010$ ) of survey participants are aware of this dual existence in society, as exemplified by the agreement that they tend to identify with the “victim” (17.5 percent), the “monster” (11.5 percent), or “both” (44.3 percent) in horror films (see figure 3.7). The survey’s open text box responses for this question illuminated queers’ common identification with the “female victim-hero”—the final girl (Clover 1992, 53). Queer horror spectators’ connection with the final girl trope significantly reveals how they specifically identify with the victimized survivor. This active yet fluid identification with the final girl is further reinforced by survey participants through responses such as: “Mostly the Monster(s), and almost always the final girl, but never really the other victims” (47260208) and “The survivor or the ‘final girl’ . . . distinct from ‘Victim’” (46927850). While Carol Clover concludes that the male spectator uses the final girl “as a vehicle for his own sadomasochistic fantasies” (1992, 53), this assessment bypasses the queer male and, more importantly, the larger queer community’s response to and use of the final girl as an identificatory victimized survivor. As a survey participant states, “I identify with the final girl, who may be victim and monster but also neither” (47169996). Queers relate more to the act of survival than the passivity of victimization, underscoring Linda Williams’s observation that “identification is neither fixed nor entirely passive” (1991, 8).

Overall, in horror films do you tend to identify with:

Overall, in horror films do you tend to identify with:	As a member of the LGBTQ+ community, do you feel that you have a different reaction to horror films as compared with heterosexual viewers?		No answer
	Yes	No
The “Victim”	49.37%	50.63%	0.00%
The “Monster”	63.21%	36.36%	0.42%
Both	62.43%	37.29%	0.28%
Neither	45.06%	54.82%	0.12%
Other	67.77%	32.23%	0.00%
No answer	60.00%	40.00%	0.00%

Question	Response count
45	4099
12	4102

FIGURE 3.8. Chart that exhibits survey participants who report a different reaction to horror films (as compared with heterosexual viewers) and with whom they identify in horror films.

The queer spectator’s affection for and association with the monster can be explained by Laura Westengard’s exploration of “queer dehumanization” (2019, 13) and Leila Taylor’s suggestion that “the process of dehumanization is a process of monster-making” (2019, 79), which signals the existence of the queer monster, a monster with whom queers can uniquely identify. To recapitulate, the process of queer people being dehumanized by society frames how not only the world sees queers, but also queers see the world.<sup>19</sup> Unsurprisingly, then, a chi-square test of independence (as defined in Chapter 2) indicates a probability above 99 percent that a relationship exists between <sup>19</sup> In 2019, GLAAD reported in “A Survey of American Acceptance and Attitudes Toward LGBTQ Americans Conducted by The Harris Poll” about an “erosion in LGBTQ acceptance,” stating that “there has been a decline in overall comfort and acceptance of LGBTQ people from respondents ages 18-34, with allies steadily declining among this audience since 2016” (GLAAD Accelerating Acceptance Executive Summary 2019, “A Survey of American Acceptance and Attitudes Toward LGBTQ Americans Conducted by The Harris Poll, 2019, n.p.).

queers who feel that they have a different reaction to horror films as compared with heterosexual viewers and whether they identify as both a monster and victim ( $\chi^2(4) = 108.794, p < 0.00$ ). Correspondingly, a chi-square test of independence indicates a probability above 99 percent that a relationship exists between queers who feel that being queer influences their taste in horror films and whether they identify as both a monster and victim ( $\chi^2(4) = 75.197, p < 0.00$ ). Stated differently, queers who have a cognizant understanding that their queer subjectivity alters their perceptions and tastes are more likely to identify with both the monster and the victim in horror films (see figure 3.8). The vacillation between identification with the victim and the monster is context-dependent on the film; it varies from one representation to another. Evidencing this point, survey participants state:

This is very contingent on the film in question. But overall I identify with monsters in supernatural horror, but victims if the antagonist is human male (46900710).

It really depends. If they are a monstrous Other (creature, etc.), I identify more with them. If it is a monstrous human (serial killer, etc.), I identify with the victim, unless the human is coded as a monster because they are from a marginalized identity group (47076895).

It depends. I'm more likely to ID with the 'monster' if they're a compelling or sympathetic ghost/monster/alien than I am if they're a living human. I'm more likely to ID with the 'victim' if they're a compelling/sympathetic character (47076579).

If 'monster' is human, then victim. If 'monster' is Other, then monster (47079497).

It depends on the film. I tend to identify a lot with 'final girl' archetypes or the monster if they're somehow tragic or romantic. If they're shunned or somehow punished for simply existing and being what they are, then I'll definitely be drawn to them (47079732).

It depends heavily on the characters themselves and how complex they are. Movies with character depth make it easier to identify with. I don't resonate with the monsters in terms of their brutal acts, but can resonate with being an outsider (47150431).

It totally depends. Is the 'monster' coded as Other in a way that calls attention to the ways in which institutions like heteronormativity, white supremacy, capitalism etc. marks difference as monstrous (like in True Blood, Frankenstein, etc). If so, I feel sympathy and empathy with the monster. But if the monster is the embodiment of patriarchal violence (like in I Spit on Your Grave and The Last House on the Left), I do not identify with the monster at all. As for identifying with the ‘victims,’ that’s tricky too! Who is represented? What choices are these folks making? (47249532).

It depends on which characters/figures in the film are presented. I can sympathise with the ‘monster’ if for example they’re conflicted or outcast. Otherwise I tend to sympathise with the victims (47756629).

GLAAD reports that queer-inclusive casting “indicates progress, particularly for horror films which have historically portrayed LGBTQ characters as one-dimensional victims or villains, but which remain the most popular genre among LGBTQ moviegoers” (GLAAD Media Institute 2020, 25). This overall sentiment is reductive, however, because categorizing horror’s queer characters as “one-dimensional victims or villains” underestimates how some queers seek out or find in horror representations of their own socially-constructed “monstrosity” and their resiliency to survive—and in turn reclaim them.

3.5 Women and Queers Represented in Horror

A review of two survey questions regarding female and queer characters illustrates how the data in this survey simultaneously exhibits overwhelming queer consensus yet displays nuanced intersectional differences. 75.2 percent ( $n = 3,084$ ) of all survey participants report that the presence of a strong female character affects their enjoyment of a horror film, which evidences prodigious unanimity of queer horror fans.<sup>20</sup> When comparing the segmentation of white participants compared with BIPOC participants on this same question, race/ethnicity does not demonstrate an impact on the presence of a strong female character affecting a queer horror fan’s enjoyment of a horror film; the survey data evidences through a Yule’s Q of .02 that there is no association between these two variables. A gendered data breakdown, however, reveals that more women report that the presence of a strong female character affects their enjoyment of a horror film. For 85.4 percent of women (cis, trans, and genderqueer) and 68.4 percent of men (cis, trans, and genderqueer), the presence of a strong female character creates meaning for them. While the majority of all genders affirmatively report that the presence of a strong female character affects their enjoyment of a horror film, the Yule's Q of .50 demonstrates that there is a substantial association between these gender variables. Erin Harrington notes that "women occupy a privileged place in horror film" (2018, 1), which largely stems from their significant representation in screen time; evidently, this representation connects with women. That "privileged place" is emphasized by a survey participant who succinctly states that "women are essential to horror. It doesn't exist without us" (47079311). The fact that horror is the only genre in which women are seen onscreen more than men is, arguably, a concomitant reason why queer women love horror. A Google report, "The Women Missing from the Silver Screen and the Technology Used to Find Them," states that women are on-screen 53 percent of the time in horror, as compared with 45 percent in romance, 36 percent in sci-fi films, 30 percent in biographical films, and 29 percent in action films (2017, n.p.). Representation matters to othered people; seeing ourselves represented in the world matters since the white cisheteropatriarchy predominantly privileges representing itself. The fact that women are not only seen and heard onscreen more in horror than in any other genre, but also featured as strong characters, may be a key draw for queer women (irrespective of the characters' narrative outcomes).

---

<sup>20</sup> Using the normal approximation of the binomial distribution, the 99 percent confidence interval indicates that the actual percentage in the total horror-loving queer population for whom the presence of a strong female character affects their enjoyment of a horror film ranges from 73.5 to 76.9 percent. In other words, stated with 99 percent confidence, 73.5 to 76.9 percent of all queer horror fans’ enjoyment of a horror film would be affected by the presence of a strong female character.

Similarly, women and younger queer survey participants more often report that the presence of a queer character positively affects their enjoyment of a horror film, while the nationality, race/ethnicity, or educational attainment of the survey participants does not demonstrate an impact on their enjoyment of a horror film due to the presence of a queer character. 76.8 percent ( $n = 3,150$ ) of all survey participants report that the presence of a queer character affects their enjoyment of a horror film, while moderate associations exist when comparing both women to men (Yule's Q .33) and participants under 42 to participants who are 42 and older (Yule's Q .39). There is no or negligible association when comparing responses about the presence of a queer character for US participants with non-US participants (Yule's Q .10); white participants compared with BIPOC participants (Yule's Q .01); and participants with a university/college degree compared with participants without one (Yule's  $Q = .15$ ). Since the horror genre features women on screen more than any other genre, I conclude that queer women want to see queer representation also, as queerness is another aspect of their multiplicitous identity. I also surmise that older participants are more accustomed to a lack of queer representation and do not base their identity or enjoyment on seeing queer characters, instead reveling in horror's ontological and subtextual queerness.

The majority of queer horror fans see and understand the world through a unique queer lens, distinctly relating and reacting to the horror genre as discussed prior and evidenced by this study's mixed-method data. To reiterate, the presented data privileges reporting the queer horror community in aggregate over intersectional differences because of the data's extensive consensus and because my goal is to craft the first cohesive portrait of horror-loving queers. The following section presents statistically significant positive and negative correlations, as well as the non-correlative data from this study, to create a framework through which to demonstrate the broad and specific particularities of the queer horror spectator. The data evidences an overwhelming consensus, with the majority of queer spectators reporting horror genre opinions, habits, and tastes that are widely shared within the community.

3.6 Opinions, Habits, and Tastes of the Queer Horror Fan

3.6.1 Queer Spectators' Fan Status

As established, queer spectators of the horror genre form a transnational, cross-generational, and learned fandom. Evidencing this queer fandom in the horror genre through the queer spectator mixed-method data presented here is critical because heretofore queer spectators have only been spoken for and about, not directly engaged to speak for themselves. As discussed in Chapter 2, the open-call internet distribution of a survey seeking to study "how LGBTQ+ people view horror film" yielded participants who self-identify as queer horror fans and opt-in to complete the survey. The survey promotion asked "Are you Queer for Fear?" drawing in queer participants interested in establishing the first portrait of queer spectators and to evidence queer horror fandom. 95.7 percent ( $n = 3,926$ ) of the survey participants consider themselves horror film fans—although this was not a prerequisite—and therefore, 4.3 percent ( $n = 177$ ) of the 4,103 survey participants who answered this question do not consider themselves a fan of any type of horror film. Since the survey targeted horror-loving queers, this overwhelming fandom is hardly surprising; however, “non fans” participating does mean that the results presented throughout this study incorporate queers who may have a more complicated relationship to the genre than the more obvious designation of “fan.” For example, the mixed-method data indicates queer spectators have issues with the toxicity of cisheteropatriarchal horror fandom, which I speculate could be a reason that a small percentage of survey participants do not want to identify as a fan.<sup>21</sup>

Horror Fandom

FIGURE 3.9. Bar graph that exhibits survey participants' reported level of horror fandom (0 = not a fan, 5 = massive fan).

For example, narrator Christopher Velasco points out that horror fandom “is very male. It’s very white. It’s very straight” (2020, 20). Similarly, narrator Lana Contreras “do[es] not participate in organized fandom” because the “realm unfortunately is predominantly white men” (2020, 16). These “horror bros,” as narrator Stacie Ponder identifies them, are the horror fans who “wanted tits and blood and that’s about it from their [horror] movies. They’re the ones who are idolizing the killers in the film” (2020, 5).<sup>22</sup> Regardless of horror fandom’s cisheteropatriarchal toxicity, all of the narrators and the overwhelming majority of the survey participants identify as horror fans.<sup>23</sup> The survey data shows that the unambiguous horror-loving queer is an ardent horror fan (see figure 3.9). When asked how much of a horror fan do they consider themselves to be on a scale of 0 (not a fan) to 5 (massive fan), 89.6 percent ( $n = 3,645$ ) designated their fandom in the top half (3-4-5) of the 0-5 scale, with 66.6 percent ( $n = 2,709$ ) selecting that they are either a massive fan (5) or the option under (4).

<sup>21</sup> Narrator Gabe Castro offers a reason why queers might not feel comfortable within horror fandom. Castro states: “It’s acknowledging that the front-facing fandom isn’t us. And we don’t fit there. Even going into conventions that are horror related, we were like, ‘Ooh, we can’t set up shop anywhere here. This is not for us. This isn’t where we belong’” (2020, 20). This disjuncture in horror fandom could be one reason why only 18 percent ( $n = 738$ ) of the survey participants have attended a horror convention, such as Fantastic Fest, Fangoria’s Weekend of Horrors, or Crypticon. Of the survey participants who have attended, only 10.5 percent ( $n = 77$ ) consider horror conventions to be “very queer friendly” spaces and 13.4 percent ( $n = 98$ ) consider them “not at all queer friendly.”

<sup>22</sup> Narrator Joe Fejeran expresses the shared hope of many queer horror fans for there “to be a queer exclusive horror convention. I’m just going to say that right now. There needs to be an exclusively queer horror convention” (2020, 28).

3.6.2 Childhood Introduction to Horror

How long have you thought of yourself as a horror fan?

FIGURE 3.10. Bar graph that indicates how long survey participants have thought of themselves as horror fans.

Whether or not the participant self identifies as a fan, or the strength of their horror fandom, the data indicates that the majority of survey participants have a long relationship with the horror genre. 66.4 percent ( $n = 2,599$ ) of survey participants have thought of themselves as horror fans for as far back as they can remember (see figure 3.10). Therefore, the majority of queers see their relationship to horror start in childhood, which is reinforced in the oral histories, as narrators discuss connecting with horror when they were young:

I was definitely young. I remember always being super into the act of being afraid and just fear in general (Hall 2020, 2).

<sup>23</sup> The “horror bros” historically acting as the self-appointed gatekeepers of the horror genre is representative of the toxic masculinity that permeates numerous fandoms. Suzanne Scott details, in Fake Geek Girls: Fandom, Gender, and the Convergence Culture Industry, how “spreadable misogyny is blatantly conceived and deployed as a tactic to win the space of fan culture, or at least definitively determine who is allowed to delimit and patrol its imagined borders by setting up gendered checkpoints” (2019, 85). Cisheterosexual men have established these “checkpoints” to limit access to horror fandom for marginalized communities and to maintain the “white, straight, cisgendered male conception of the fan” (Scott 2019, 77). The learnings from this study further extend Scott’s argument to include the targeted exclusion of nonnormative genders and/or sexualities through misogynistic, homophobic, and transphobic behaviors that are weaponized to uphold the cisheteropatriarchal horror fandom model.

I think my love of horror probably began properly with some of my aunts on my dad's side of the family showing me things that I probably wasn't really supposed to see when I was maybe eight or nine. My aunts showing me films like Beetlejuice and The Addams Family and things that you can watch as a kid. But the films were slowly getting more and more violent and horrific. The Hellraiser films. That sort of stuff that slightly older family members would sneak and let you watch and I remember being really really scared but very excited at the same time because you weren't supposed to be doing that (Thompson 2020, 2).

Ooh . . . my relationship to the horror genre first blossomed when I was . . . I would say three or four years old. I was obsessed with Beetlejuice (Hudson 2020, 2).

I think my relationship to horror is actually really funny because I think I was born into horror, in a way. My mom went into labor while watching Cujo in 1983 [laughs] around 10am or 9am. . . . But then, growing up, I realized that I was just so fascinated by horror (Velasco 2020, 2).

I was always shown horror through my family—they're big horror fans themselves and are very much the type of people who don't really obey the rated R or understand that kids shouldn't see certain things. To them, you know, what doesn't kill you makes you stronger (Castro 2020, 2).

When I was really young Scooby-Doo developed my interest in monster movies and horror comedies (Colangelo 2020, 2).

Horror was always a part of my life (Davis 2020, 2).

I grew up with my two youngest aunts and my youngest uncle, and they were teenagers in the nineties. And we all lived together because we're undocumented and we're poor, and we're trying to make it in the United States. So we all lived in one apartment. I remember they were teenagers, and of course they want to watch a horror film, and they're babysitting me so that means that I'm watching it. And so I watched all the Chuckys. I watched Children of the Corn. I watched Pumpkinhead and watched Freddy. I watched it all and I watched it with them growing up. I mean, I couldn't sleep because I was fear stricken that that monster was going to come and get me. But that's how I started watching movies (Contreras 2020, 6).

It started as a kid. It started with fear and gradually became an obsession (Estes 2020, 2).

Honestly, I can't remember any defining incident—there's no memory that is specific as far as 'that's the moment' when I became interested in all things that were spooky or dark or macabre. I can only remember always liking that stuff, you know, for as far back as my memory goes (Grannell 2020, 2).

My relationship to the horror genre developed in childhood, I think as a lot of people's did (Varrati 2020, 2).

It's been a huge part of my life for pretty much my entire life. My parents—my mother in particular—was a huge and still is a huge horror movie fan (Ponder 2020, 2).

One of my first memories of seeing a movie—it wasn't even like a horror movie but one that was kind of scary that I loved—was my mom taking me to see that The Brothers Grimm movie with Heath Ledger. I just remember her taking me and I was really young, and I was scared but it was fun, and it was such a cool story and I thought to myself 'I like this,' 'I want to know more about this,' 'I want to know what else is going on' (Stodola 2020, 2).

As shown, the majority of queer horror spectators are engaged fans whose relationship with the genre started in childhood. This study's mixed-method data demonstrates that most queer horror spectators had a childhood relationship to horror and, as a significant counterpoint to the emphases of previous academic studies, the queer spectator does not lose interest in the genre as they age. Using the normal approximation of the binomial distribution, the 99 percent confidence interval indicates those who would answer they have thought of themselves as horror fans for as far back as they can remember ranges from 64.4 percent to 68.3 percent in the total queer horror fan population. In other words, stated with 99 percent confidence, 64.4 percent to 68.3 percent of all horror-loving queers have been horror fans for as far back as they can remember. Unsurprisingly, given that the majority of survey participants have been horror fans as far back as they can remember, the survey results show that 59.2 percent ( $n = 2,427$ ) of all survey participants first started watching horror films under the age of 12 and that 91.4 percent ( $n = 3,746$ ) first started watching horror films by age 17 (see figure 3.11).<sup>24</sup> This data therefore bolsters extant empirical studies about the horror spectator that repeatedly reaffirm a young horror audience (even while privileging the cisheterosexual male subject), such as Tamborini and Stiff, who assert that the horror genre is “enjoyed more by males and by younger viewers” (1987, 415). Tamborini and Stiff also reference Leo Handel’s 1955 survey results to bolster their claim that horror audiences are young.<sup>25</sup> Vera Dika, while discussing a specific horror audience that was “55 percent female,” goes further to state that the “audience for the stalker film, as is typical of the horror genre, is overwhelmingly young . . . frequented by adolescents between the ages of twelve and seventeen” (Dika 1990, 87). Similarly, William Paul writes that “the predominant audience” for horror is “young (roughly from adolescence to perhaps the late twenties)” (1994, 4). This survey’s data supports these findings and goes further to show that the frequency with which participants watch horror films increased (55.3 percent) or stayed the same (31 percent) since they first started watching horror films, which either suggests that previous studies overgeneralized the youth of horror film audiences or, more interestingly and as I surmise, indicates that queer spectators have a more sustained relationship with the horror genre.

---

<sup>24</sup> Using the normal approximation of the binomial distribution, the 99 percent confidence interval indicates that the actual percentage in the total horror-loving queer population who first started watching horror films age 17 and under ranges from 90.3 to 92.5 percent. The 99 percent confidence interval indicates that the actual percentage in the total horror-loving queer population who first started watching horror films under 12 years old ranges from 57.2 percent to 61.2 percent.

How old were you when you first started watching horror films?

FIGURE 3.11. Bar graph that indicates the age of survey participants when they first started watching horror films.

3.6.3 Horror as Interpersonal Connection

While this study argues that queer spectators have a distinctive relationship to the horror genre directly connected to their nonnormative sexualities and/or genders, notwithstanding, horror serves as a connective bridge between queer people and people outside the queer community.<sup>26</sup> The queer spectator’s ability to connect with non-queer communities about horror does not diminish or alter the relationship between queerness and the genre, but instead indicates that queer spectators can code-switch in sharing their love of horror with others. Stated differently, queers discuss horror with other queers differently from how they speak to heterosexuals about horror.<sup>27</sup> One explanation for this behavior could be queer horror fans’ passion for horror. Survey participant responses confirm that they are vocal about their love for the genre, with 96.3 percent ( $n = 3,949$ ) of them having close friends and 90.2 percent ( $n = 3,690$ ) of them having family of origin<sup>28</sup> members know that they are fans of horror films. Survey participants’ love of the genre is also found to be common for their close social units, with 85.5 percent ( $n = 3,503$ ) of their close friends and/or partner(s) also being interested in horror.<sup>29</sup>

<sup>25</sup> Furthermore, Tamborini and Stiff’s theoretical assessment is based on 155 survey respondents leaving a movie theatre in “a large midwestern city” in fall of 1982 after seeing Halloween II.

What started your interest in the horror genre? select all that apply

FIGURE 3.12. Bar graph that shows what started survey participants’ interest in the horror genre.

<sup>26</sup> Narrator Joe Fejeran discusses how horror can be “a way for queer people to connect with their cishet family members and to have that common connection” (2020, 19).

<sup>27</sup> Narrators Gabe Castro and Joe Fejeran affirm that while horror functions as a connective entry point with cisheterosexual people, the queer connection to the genre remains distinct. For Castro, horror offers “an opportunity to be connected to a group of people and my family, but we were also enjoying [the films] differently” (2020, 7). Fejeran explains that horror is “also a way for, again, as we mentioned that horror as heirloom, it was a way for queer people to connect with their cishet family members and to have that common connection. It’s so funny, you know, we—Joshua and I—will go to conventions and we’ll talk about loving a particular film that a heterosexual person will love. And we love it for completely different reasons, but we’re able to use that connection” (2020, 19).

<sup>28</sup> Family of origin, also known as first family, refers to one’s parent(s) and any potential sibling(s) with whom they were raised by and with, whether biological, adoptive, or guardian.

<sup>29</sup> Queers with a mostly LGBTQ+ friend group are those most likely to have a friend or partner also interested in horror, at 87.6 percent.

This human connection to horror is further highlighted by the 7.8 percent of the survey participants who made the effort to write in answers not offered in the question's list of responses when asked about their introduction to horror; the majority of those noted being introduced to the horror genre by parents, grandparents, siblings, aunts, uncles, spouses, babysitters, and friends. While films are overwhelmingly the primary gateway to horror for 90.9 percent ( $n = 3,733$ ) of participants, many queer spectators are introduced to horror via a human connection (see figure 3.12).<sup>30</sup> Similarly, Cherry's study ascertained that for female horror viewers "there is a sense in which many feel that the taste for horror is inherited, not in a genetic sense, but in having parents who also liked horror" (1999, 210).

While some survey participants shared that their parents and grandparents introduced them to horror, the queer horror inheritance remains distinct (due to distinctly fractured or alienated relationships with first family many queers experience); the majority of narrators discuss coming to the genre on their own, while several mention how their families of origin expressed concern about their taste for horror. The survey data confirms that nearly half, 47.4 percent, of survey participants who come from families of origin with an opinion about their horror interests, report that their families either reacted with open discouragement or expressed reservations; whereas, 35.5 percent received encouragement from their families of origin. For those and other queers, horror is inherited from their queer chosen family.<sup>31</sup> Narrator Joe Fejeran emphasizes this point when he discusses "horror as heirloom" and coming to his love of horror through his Fright School podcast partner and queer friend Joshua Napier—who inherited his love of horror from his mother (2020, 19). Fejeran shares: "Joshua, in his infinite wisdom, decided to take it upon himself to show me different horror films. And we started to have these really in-depth conversations about horror and why horror is important and what it says about the times in which we're living and about people and all these things" (2020, 3). While Napier inherited horror from his family of origin and Fejeran from his chosen family, the survey data and the oral histories confirm that horror is a human connection regardless of how one was introduced to the genre.

---

<sup>30</sup> Since a significant number of survey participants electively report family and friends also enjoying the genre, future queer spectator studies should investigate further the importance of human connections and relationships to the development of their horror fandom.

<sup>31</sup> "'Chosen family' is a term employed within queer and transgender (Q/T) communities to describe family groups constructed by choice rather than by biological or legal (bio-legal) ties" (Levin et al. 2020, 1).

3.6.4 Queer Spectators' Knowledgeability of the Horror Genre

Queer spectators are knowledgeable about horror films; however, they utilize this information as a point of connection rather than to reinforce differences or establish social hierarchies with others. 83.2 percent ( $n = 3,397$ ) of survey participants report that, overall, they consider themselves to have a level of knowledgeability about the genre. Specifically, 73.3 percent ( $n = 2,483$ ) of survey participants claim to be “very knowledgeable” or “knowledgeable” about horror film.<sup>32</sup> The narratives gathered in the Queer for Fear Oral History Collection also underscore the dexterity with which queer horror fans seamlessly demonstrate their intertextual, extratextual, and paratextual horror film knowledge. John Fiske, elaborating on the work of Pierre Bourdieu, notes that “the accumulation of knowledge is fundamental to the accumulation of cultural capital” (1992a, 42); however, this study’s oral history narratives evidence different ways in which accumulated cultural capital functions for queer people. Their horror film knowledge is not only a mechanism for “social prestige and self-esteem” (Fiske 1992a, 33), but also, distinctly and meaningfully, a source of human-focused connection and method of community-building with other queer horror fans—relationship forging that decenters the capitalistic emphasis of Fiske’s theory. In fact, the mixed-method data considered together evidences that queer communities have their own economies of knowledge, with queer horror fandom as a germane part of that. However, a significant aspect of the queer spectator’s accrual and use of cultural capital within queer circles is the emotional connection that cultural capital, such as horror knowledge, creates amongst queers and which holds no proper (or fiscal) function in the cisheterosexual world. Indeed, this study’s oral histories exist in part because of an emotional connection between me and the narrators that is steeped in accumulated knowledge about the horror genre—a shared connection of queerness and a love of horror. Narrators and participants accentuate this queered connection over horror:

---

<sup>32</sup> When asked to designate their level of horror knowledge, 29.4 percent selected the option “Very knowledgeable” ( $n = 995$ ), 43.9 percent “Knowledgeable” ( $n = 1,488$ ), and 26.7 percent “Somewhat knowledgeable” ( $n = 903$ ).

When someone who's queer and into horror comes up and we're like—'we know'—whether I've ever met them in my life or not, there's just certain ways that we're going to talk about those movies. It's like, 'Gurl, you're going to love this and here's why.' It's just an instant connection and that double connection about the horror. There's just information you have about that person. And I think horror is closer to the queer community. A gay person that doesn't like horror, I'm like, 'Hold on!' [laughs] Like, not 'Can I see your papers?' but, you know, something's not quite right there. A gay horror person, I understand a little bit more, but a queer horror person, it's instant family. It's instant intimacy and you're like we're going to a different place. That's going to be already built in. It's already there (Davis 2020, 10).

It's funny, I go to this convention in St. Louis called TransWorld—that's what it's called, of all things. It's not for the drag part of my life. It's the largest haunters convention in the world, and it's TransWorld [both laugh]. Isn't that hilarious? And most of the people there are these Midwestern haunters. It's still very much a straight white guy thing, and they have these giant haunted attractions and they roll in. It's the industry standard. But when you're walking around TransWorld and you see another queen, because you share these two things, immediately, there's an attraction like, [gasps] 'Oh, I need to be your friend.' And I love that, that there's still this world where I seek that out because it's not the norm (Grannell 2020d, 13).

My love of horror has brought me together with other people. This is embarrassing, but I'm going to say it 'cause it's good for the research. Once I started to own my horror identity [chuckles], own that part of my identity, I put it in my online dating profiles. I just updated everything. It's like, 'I love horror movies!' And then I started to get more responses. I started to realize that as queer people there's that connection, that affinity, that we have for horror (Fejeran 2020, 19).

I've always tried to share horror with people, even when they're really like, 'I don't like horror movies' [laughs]. I guess because it's so important to me, or something, that I want to share it with people that I like or love (Ponder 2020, 6).

I've found that by connecting with other queer horror fans online I can find people who share my feelings for the genre (47082733).

We can share the [horror film] experience in a way that you just can't with het people (48902723).

These narrators underscore how queer horror fans are always already connected—a connection that relies on a shared queered love of horror despite any intersectional differences.

3.6.5 Queer Identities and Identifications as Queer

Since the majority of queer spectators of horror film understand their queerness to be a lens that alters their horror reactions and preferences, their explicitly queer interactions with the horror genre demonstrate nuanced differences in their opinions, as evidenced through a detailed evaluation of this subgroup through statistical analysis (presenting statistically significant positive and negative correlations in addition to the non-correlative survey data). The survey data reveals that queer spectators who have a conscious awareness that their queerness affects their tastes and provides them with a different lens have an even more distinctive queered relationship to the horror genre. Horror spectators whose queerness creates a different reaction to and taste in horror films are less inclined to enjoy experiencing jump scares, viewing explicit sexual violence, and watching people get murdered, and, furthermore, do not experience increased enjoyment from increased gore in a film. When comparing those horror fans who report that their queerness creates a different reaction to horror films ( $n = 2,339$ ) with the horror-loving queers who feel that being queer influences their taste in horror film ( $n = 2,290$ ), the data demonstrates a large overlap, with a highly statistically significant relationship and a large effect size ( $\chi^2(1) = 1133.022, p < .000, \text{Cramér's } V = .526, n = 4,088$ ).<sup>33</sup> In fact, these two groups of horror fans are so aligned that they completely correlate in their agreement or disagreement with opinions about horror films. The survey presented 24 statements<sup>34</sup> to understand the horror-loving queer relationship to horror.<sup>35</sup> The results from 48 bivariate correlation tests (as defined in Chapter 2), comparing how queerness affects queer horror fans' reactions and taste, reveal matching positive or negative correlations for 20 (83.3 percent) of the statement questions.<sup>36</sup>

---

<sup>33</sup> Additionally, the Yule's Q of .83 indicates a very strong association between the survey participants who answered "yes" to "As a member of the LGBTQ+ community, do you feel that you have a different reaction to horror films as compared with heterosexual viewers?" and to "Do you feel that being queer influences your taste in horror films?"

<sup>34</sup> 13 of the 24 statements were borrowed, revised, and repurposed from Cherry so as to have a direct comparative, as detailed in Chapter 2.

<sup>35</sup> The Spearman rank-order correlations indicate that the same small to moderate correlations (whether positive or negative) also exist in the total population of horror-loving queers.

<sup>36</sup> There are four statement questions that yielded no correlations: "I like horror films with lots of suspense and/or tension" 93 percent ( $n = 3,794$ ); "I enjoy being frightened by horror films" 89.6 percent ( $n = 3,660$ ); "Horror films relieve the tedium of my everyday life" 84.8 percent ( $n =$

Even though the Spearman's rho correlation test does not definitively state how the two examined variables positively or negatively affect one another, at times, the correlation can be ascertained despite the fact that correlations do not indicate directionality or causation. For example, a statistically significant negative correlation exists between perceptions of queerness altering reactions to or tastes in horror and opinions about jump scares. Jump scares affecting queerness are much less plausible than queerness affecting opinions of jump scares. While the "startle effect or the 'jump scare' is, quite easily, the most prevalent somatic effect encouraged and exploited by Horror" (Aldana Reyes 2016, 151), only a slight majority, 51.4 percent, of survey participants strongly agree or agree that they enjoy "jump scares" or being startled while watching horror films, with 28.8 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement. Horror affect—specifically the ubiquitous jump scare—"is a lot more direct, corporeal and somatic than it is context-dependent" (Aldana Reyes 2016, 18), meaning that bodily reactions may be analyzed separately from sociopolitical and psychological contexts. The disentanglement of the affected body from its embodied contexts functions to strip away social, cultural, political, and psychological meanings, which, in this case, translates into whether the affected body enjoys the physical reaction or not.<sup>37</sup> A love of the horror genre and having physical "jump" reactions to startle scares in films does not predicate enjoyment of those "corporeal and somatic" reactions. While 51.4 percent of survey participants strongly agree or agree that they enjoy "jump scares," the queer horror fans whose queerness affects their reactions to and tastes in horror enjoy jump scares less ("different reaction"  $r_s = -.07, p < .000$  and queer "taste"  $r_s = -.07, p < .000$ ). Stated differently, queers who report that their queerness alters their reactions to or tastes in horror are less inclined to enjoy jump scares. Similarly, this same subset of queer horror fans had small effect negative correlations with the following statements:

---

3,461); and "I prefer horror films in which 'the monster' is hidden or unseen" 53.9 percent ( $n = 2,196$ ).

<sup>37</sup> For example, narrator Harmony Colangelo states: "Jump scares are lazy. You'll be startled. You'll feel startled. But not scared. It's not a prolonged feeling. It's more of a visceral response" (2020, 34).

- “The gorier the horror film, the more I enjoy it” (“different reaction”  $r_s = -.04, p < .006$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = -.05, p < .004$ )<sup>38</sup>
- “I like watching people being attacked or killed in horror films” (“different reaction”  $r_s = -.06, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = -.08, p < .000$ )<sup>39</sup>
- “I am comfortable viewing explicitly sexual violence, such as rape” (“different reaction”  $r_s = -.12, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = -.11, p < .000$ ).

This negative correlations data demonstrates that horror films do not function solely as vehicles for queer spectators to enjoy watching people being attacked or killed; the queer spectators who consciously report that their queerness alters their horror opinions and tastes are less inclined to love a horror film because of jump scares, gore, or sexual violence. This data indicates that the “obvious” aspects of the horror genre, overall, hold less appeal to horror’s queer spectatorial majority who report a queer lens, which suggests that horror gives these queer spectators a more subtle and queer connection, such as coded or subtextual identification with the monster, the victim, and/or the final girl.

The following positive correlations evidence that queer spectators who understand their queerness affects their reactions to and tastes in horror are more inclined to strongly agree with the majority of the following presented statement questions. Queer spectators whose queerness affects their reactions to and tastes in horror have small and medium, yet highly statistically significant positive correlations with the following statements:

- “Horror films are cathartic” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .17, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .16, p < .000$ )
- “Horror films help me face my fears” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .13, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .12, p < .000$ )
- “Horror films help me work through trauma” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .20, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .19, p < .000$ )
- “Horror films let me use my imagination” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .07, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .06, p < .000$ )

---

<sup>38</sup> 27.7 percent of queer horror fans strongly agree or agree that the gorier the horror film, the more they enjoy it, with 35.1 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement.

<sup>39</sup> 43.7 percent of queer horror fans strongly agree or agree that they like watching people being attacked or killed in horror films, with 18.6 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement.

- “Horror films make me laugh” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .11, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .09, p < .000$ )
- “Horror films are more frightening than they used to be” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .52, p < .001$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .06, p < .000$ )
- “21st-century horror films are too violent and gory” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .07, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .06, p < .000$ )
- “I like horror films with a queer protagonist or character” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .26, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .27, p < .000$ )
- “I most enjoy watching horror films with queer audiences” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .34, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .35, p < .000$ )
- “I enjoy ‘camp-y’ horror films” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .16, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .17, p < .000$ )
- “There is too much heterosexual sex in horror films” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .18, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .14, p < .000$ )
- “I watch horror films as a form of escapism” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .09, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .07, p < .000$ )
- “I often relate to ‘the monster’ in horror films” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .25, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .22, p < .000$ )
- “I watch horror films for the special/practical/visual effects and make-up” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .07, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .08, p < .000$ )
- “I empathize with or relate to the heroine/hero/final girl” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .14, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .16, p < .000$ )
- “I have to shut my eyes/hide my face during horror films” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .04, p < .013$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .06, p < .000$ )

This data indicates that, for the majority of queer horror spectators, the horror genre functions as a form of escapism, a cathartic release valve, and a trauma processor (a topic that will be further examined in Chapter 4); horror films help queer horror fans face and deal with their fears. Queers also have a preference for explicitly queer representation and interactions, both liking horror films with queer characters and enjoying watching horror films with queer audiences. Queer horror fans relate to the monster and empathize with the final girl. Moreover, they have a preference for campy horror and, accordingly, tend to laugh at horror films (see Chapters 4 and 5). Queer horror fans think there is too much heterosexual sex in horror and they love special effects. These statistical correlations suggest that spectators who have consciousness of their queer lens (which, as a reminder, is the majority of horror's queer spectators based on extrapolation from this survey's data) also have a different relationship to horror. These queer spectators are less inclined to enjoy horror simply for the sex, violence, and gore, and are more inclined to queerly, intellectually, and imaginatively relate to the genre for its therapeutic functions, camp aesthetic, intentional (and unintentional) humor, and relatable depictions of monstrosity and survival.

3.6.6 Queer Horror Spectators Compared with Female Horror Fans

Understanding how and why queer spectators uniquely connect with horror through this extensive mixed-method data set is furthered when compared with existing data on female horror fans. The significant study on female horror fandom by Brigid Cherry, completed in 1999, provides a direct comparative, as discussed in Chapter 2, to determine any statistical differences between queer and female horror fans in their horror opinions. Ultimately, this study's data patently demonstrates that queer horror fans are a distinct subgroup of horror fans compared with the mostly heterosexual participants of Cherry's study. The vast majority of the queer spectator's data differs significantly from Cherry's data on female horror fans in which "the majority of the respondents are heterosexual" (1999, 149), buttressing the argument for a sui generis relationship of queers with the horror genre. The queer relationship to horror manifests in enjoying being immersed in some of the affects that are designed to scare people because horror provides queer spectators with a way to assuage the pain from life's challenges. The vast majority of queer spectators, then, have an elemental connection to the genre by gaining relief from life's ennui through the suspense, tension, and frights in horror films. In fact, survey participants strongly agree or agree with the following statements:

- 93 percent ( $n = 3,794$ ) report, "I like horror films with lots of suspense and/or tension"
- 89.6 percent ( $n = 3,660$ ) report, "I enjoy being frightened by horror films"
- 84.8 percent ( $n = 3,461$ ) report, "Horror films relieve the tedium of my everyday life"

- 53.9 percent ( $n = 2,196$ ) report, “I prefer horror films in which ‘the monster’ is hidden or unseen”

In comparison, Cherry’s surveyed female horror fans also enjoy suspense and frights but do not use horror to relieve the tedium of everyday life in the same proportion, and more interestingly, in the same way as horror-loving queers. 47.7 percent of the female horror fans agree strongly or agree with the statement that horror films relieve the tedium of their everyday life, and 31.8 percent disagree strongly or disagree, whereas only 3.8 percent of queer participants in this study strongly disagree or disagree with the same statement. This differential between female and queer survey participants distinguishes how the overwhelming majority of queer horror fans uniquely find relief through horror. 87.5 percent of the statement questions received majority consensus opinions from all the survey participants, whereas the female horror fans of Cherry’s study reached consensus on just over half of the questions. In all, the responses from queer horror fans demonstrate a distinctive difference between queer and female horror fans (including questions without a majority consensus opinion):

- 94 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that horror films let them use their imagination, with only 1 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (compared with 73.1 percent of female horror fans agreeing strongly or agreeing and 12.1 percent disagreeing strongly or disagreeing)
- 93 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that they like horror films with a lot of suspense and/or tension, with only 1.4 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (compared with 91.7 percent of female horror fans agreeing strongly or agreeing and 3.7 percent disagreeing strongly or disagreeing)
- 89.6 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that they enjoy being frightened by horror films, with only 2.7 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (compared with 73.1 percent of female horror fans agreeing strongly or agreeing and 19.4 percent disagreeing strongly or disagreeing)
- 87.5 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that they like horror films with a queer protagonist or character, with only .6 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (no comparative data)
- 84.8 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that horror films relieve the tedium of my everyday life, with only 3.8 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (compared with 47.7 percent of female horror fans agreeing strongly or agreeing and 31.8 percent disagreeing strongly or disagreeing)

- 82.9 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that they watch horror films as a form of escapism, with only 5.9 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (compared with 54.2 percent of female horror fans agreeing strongly or agreeing and 28.4 percent disagreeing strongly or disagreeing)
- 80.4 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that they enjoy “camp-y” horror films, with only 6 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (no comparative data)
- 73.5 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that horror films make them laugh, with only 8.1 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (compared with 40.8 percent of female horror fans agreeing strongly or agreeing and 32.4 percent disagreeing strongly or disagreeing)
- 69.3 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that they watch horror films for the special/practical/visual effects and make-up, with only 11.4 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (compared with 29.4 percent of female horror fans agreeing strongly or agreeing and 34.8 percent disagreeing strongly or disagreeing)
- 67.9 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that they empathize with or relate to the heroine/hero/final girl, with only 8.2 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (compared with 16.5 percent of female horror fans agreeing strongly or agreeing and 46.7 percent disagreeing strongly or disagreeing<sup>40</sup>)
- 61.4 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that there is too much heterosexual sex in horror films, with only 10 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (no comparative data)
- 59 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that horror films help them face their fears, with only 12.5 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (compared with 21.5 percent of female horror fans agreeing strongly or agreeing and 45.8 percent disagreeing strongly or disagreeing)
- 54 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that they most enjoy watching horror films with queer audiences, with only 4.6 percent

---

<sup>40</sup> Cherry wrote “hero” and “heroine” as two separate questions, so I calculated this by taking the average response from both questions. 15.2 percent of female horror fans agree strongly or agree and 50.5 percent disagree strongly or disagree with the statement “I empathize with the hero.” 17.8 percent of female horror fans agree strongly or agree and 42.9 percent disagree strongly or disagree with the statement “I empathise with the heroine” (1999, 246-247).

strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (no comparative data)

- 53.9 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that they prefer horror films in which “the monster” is hidden or unseen, with only 11 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (compared with 27.7 percent of female horror fans agreeing strongly or agreeing and 42.6 percent disagreeing strongly or disagreeing)
- 25.8 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that they have to shut their eyes/hide their face during horror films, with a majority 54.4 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (compared with 19.2 percent of female horror fans agreeing strongly or agreeing and 67 percent disagreeing strongly or disagreeing)
- 17.4 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that they are comfortable viewing explicitly sexual violence, such as rape, with 64.6 percent, a majority, strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (no comparative data)
- 45 percent of queer participants strongly agree or agree that they often relate to “the monster” in horror films, with 19.7 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement; however, only 21.1 percent of female horror fans agreeing strongly or agreeing and 55 percent disagreeing strongly or disagreeing<sup>41</sup>

These statistical comparisons between the queer horror spectator and female horror fans indicate that queers, overall, demonstrate a more therapeutic relationship with the genre, experiencing beneficial alleviations, character identifications, and imaginative connections through horror. Even though cisgender heterosexual women face marginalization, discrimination, and oppression in a patriarchal system, the data does not indicate that women turn to horror for therapeutic relief. This comparative data further underscores the primary argument of this study that queer spectators have a distinctive relationship with the horror genre specifically due to their queer embodiment.

3.6.7 Non-Cinematic Modes of Horror Consumption

The preponderance of queer horror fans engage with the horror genre beyond simply watching horror films. This following list of extras enjoyed by queer horror fans intimates that queer spectators seek to understand both textual and extratextual information about horror films. The majority of queer horror spectators enjoy horror film “extras,” including:

---

<sup>41</sup> Cherry’s question stated: “I empathize with the monster.”

- 71.3 percent ( $n = 2,838$ ) enjoy “deleted scenes”
- 67.9 percent ( $n = 2,701$ ) enjoy “making of. . . documentaries”
- 61.3 percent ( $n = 2,440$ ) enjoy “outtakes / bloopers”
- 58.5 percent ( $n = 2,326$ ) enjoy “Easter eggs”
- 56.2 percent ( $n = 2,235$ ) enjoy “behind-the-scenes footage”
- 56.0 percent ( $n = 2,226$ ) enjoy “director’s cuts”
- 52.8 percent ( $n = 2,102$ ) enjoy “special / visual / digital effects footage”

This textual and extratextual engagement further bolsters claims about the queer spectator’s horror knowledge, as discussed previously in this chapter.

3.6.8 Queer Spectators and International Horror

From which of the following countries do you watch horror films? select all that apply

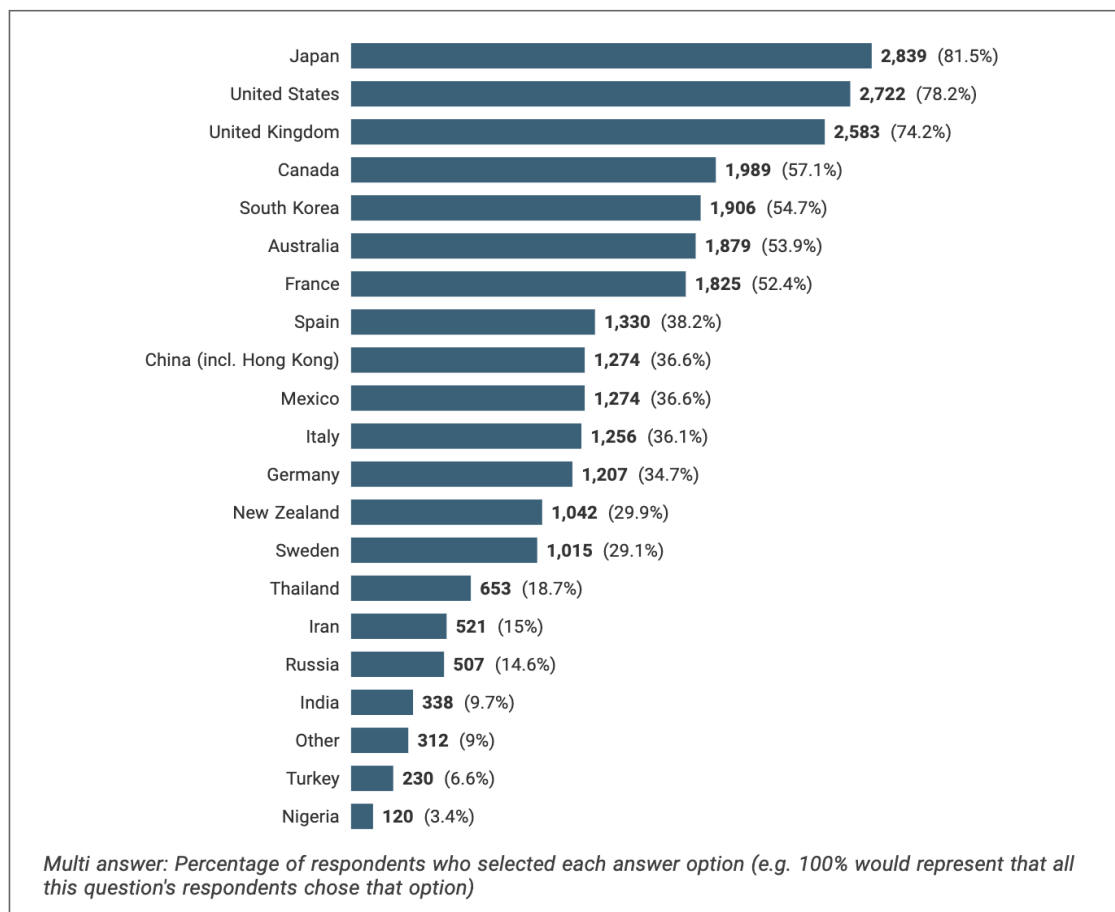

FIGURE 3.13. Bar graph that displays from which production countries survey participants report watching horror films.

The queer spectator’s love of horror extends to a love of horror film beyond a fan’s home country, demonstrating that queer spectators form a transnational fandom interested in international horror texts, with 86 percent ( $n = 3,521$ ) of queer horror fans, the vast majority, watching horror films from different countries around the world (see figure 3.13). The majority of survey participants watch horror films from Japan (81.5 percent), the US (78.2 percent), the UK (74.2 percent), Canada (57.1 percent), South Korea (54.7 percent), Australia (53.9 percent), and France (52.4 percent). Stephen Follows reports that “by an overwhelming majority, the US produces more horror films than any other country in the world,” and that the “UK, Canada and Japan are unsurprisingly the next largest producers of horror” (2017, 62). Correspondingly, Japan (81.5 percent), the US (78.2 percent), the UK (74.2 percent), and Canada (57.1 percent), the top four countries that produce horror films, are also the top countries from which queer horror fans watch horror films.<sup>42</sup> In sum, the data indicates that the queer spectator is internationalist in their horror-viewing habits, actively engaging with cultural manifestations of horror that may be different from their own.

3.6.9 Cinemagoing and Queer Spectators

This survey’s data reveals that a significant portion of the queer population is amongst the most engaged cinema goers, undoubtedly demonstrating that horror-loving queers are a fervent collective of cinephiles. The GLAAD Studio Responsibility Index report states that queers “are a significant [cinema-going] audience” (2020, 8), while the Motion Picture Association reports that “eleven percent of the U.S./Canada population are frequent moviegoers who attend the cinema once a month or more” (2020, 27). Survey results for this study, in fact, evidence that a remarkable 47.7 percent of survey participants are “frequent moviegoers” who go to the movie theatre once a month or more. To that end, this project’s survey found that 20.9 percent of survey participants watch horror films at the cinema or movie theatre once a month or more—nearly double the 11 percent of the general population who are frequent moviegoers.<sup>43</sup> As will be discussed in Chapter 5, queer spectators find sanctuary in both the filmic

---

<sup>42</sup> While it may be surprising that the US does not top this list, especially given the overall influence of US horror globally, a potential reason may be because the majority of the survey participants are from the US and assumed that it would be understood that they watch US horror. Interestingly, while Japan is a top horror producer, Follows and Nash point out that the horror genre actually performs “less well in Japan” than other genres (2016, n.p.).

<sup>43</sup> As will be discussed in Chapter 5, the long-term impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on cinema-going habits has yet to be seen, but is likely to have lasting impact and should be investigated in future studies.

medium and the cinema-going experience. Beyond horror films, survey participants enjoy many other genres, with 80.1 percent watching thriller/suspense films, 76.3 percent watching sci-fi films, 65.4 percent watching fantasy films, 65.1 percent watching comedy films, and 63.2 percent watching documentary films.<sup>44</sup> The predominance of survey participants also watch narrative (86.4 percent) and documentary (79 percent) films that are explicitly categorized as LGBTQ+. Inversely, only 2.9 percent of survey participants watch sports films, 10.7 percent watch war films, 13.9 percent watch westerns, 23.1 percent watch family films, and 26.8 watch romance films, rounding out the bottom five genres. Queer spectators are not only ardent horror spectators but also cinephiles who enjoy a wide range of film genres, barring the least watched which are arguably the most emblematic of patriarchal cisheteronormativity: sports, war, westerns, family, and romance.

3.6.10 Horror Habits Beyond Film Spectatorship

Queer spectators of horror are regular cinemagoers, avid readers, and social media users who actively engage in horror fandom, including enjoying horror in other media. This supports the fandom data reported prior in this chapter that demonstrates queer horror fans are passionate about horror. Queer horror fans not only love film but are also socially engaged with the genre, as 77.8 percent ( $n = 3,190$ ) of survey participants follow horror accounts on social media.<sup>45</sup> Additionally, 65 percent both actively (“read and comment”  $n = 742$ ) and passively (“read only”  $n = 1,922$ ) participate in fan forums, fan websites, online blogs, and/or Facebook groups about horror. Significantly, all narrators interviewed are queer horror fans who explicitly and implicitly participate in horror fandom’s cultural production as artists, podcasters, public programmers and performers, writers, and/or content creators.<sup>46</sup> Creating a podcast, making art, writing blog posts and articles, and curating a social media feed “requires

---

<sup>44</sup> Nielsen reports that the top five genres among LGBTQ audiences are Horror, Sci-Fi or Fantasy, Romance, Drama, and Graphic Novels/Comics (page 9). Interestingly, while this study’s results support Nielsen’s findings that horror, sci-fi, and fantasy are in the top five genres, survey participants ranked romance in the bottom five, with only 26.8 percent watching romance films. While this study did not capture data on the genre named as “graphic novels/comics,” the survey finds that 59.9 percent of survey participants watch animation/anime films and 52.2 percent watch superhero films.

<sup>45</sup> The top three social networking services used by survey participants are Twitter (72.5 percent), Instagram (68.8 percent), and Facebook (58.8 percent).

<sup>46</sup> Future studies would be well served to capture data on the number of queer spectators who explicitly participate in horror fandom.

explicit action to participate in a community and consciously produce media texts and artefacts,” whilst double-tapping or liking a photo or post “exists below the threshold of explicit participation and goes beyond mere participation in a surrounding culture” (Schäfer 2011, 44). These explicit and implicit forms of participation further underscore a distinctive engagement that queers have with the horror genre. The queer spectator’s horror engagement, in fact, extends beyond a single medium, with 80.8 percent ( $n = 3,284$ ) of survey participants also watching and/or streaming horror genre television (including web television) programs. As well, 69.5 percent of these survey participants watch horror shows once a month or more, with 31.3 percent watching them once a week or more. Moreover, queer horror spectators are horror bingers, as 80.5 percent ( $n = 2,027$ ) regularly binge new horror shows and/or new seasons of existing horror series.

The queer spectator’s love for horror is not limited to moving images but extends to other subjects and art forms, including literature. A formidable 77.8 percent of survey participants list reading as an activity they regularly enjoy. 75.7 percent ( $n = 3,106$ ) of those read horror and/or gothic fiction, with 77.5 percent ( $n = 3,148$ ) specifying that horror is their top genre to read, followed by LGBTQ+ books (64.4 percent) and graphic novels (60.8 percent). Comparatively, Cherry found for female horror fans that reading is an “extremely popular pastime” and reported that 47 percent of female participants selected reading as a hobby/interest, with horror being the number one genre to read, followed by fantasy and sci-fi (1999, 81). Another subject queer spectators are passionate about is Halloween. Since “Halloween is widely celebrated as a gay high holy holiday” (Skal 2016, 124), unsurprisingly, 74.7 percent ( $n = 2,950$ ) of survey participants are interested in Halloween / Samhain / Day of the Dead. Further, a majority of queer spectators are also interested in the following subjects:

- 73.0 percent ( $n = 2,883$ ) have interest in real life haunted places
- 66.7 percent ( $n = 2,635$ ) in true crime and serial killers
- 64.9 percent ( $n = 2,564$ ) in witchcraft
- 63.1 percent ( $n = 2,491$ ) in entertainment haunted attractions and haunts
- 52.3 percent ( $n = 2,064$ ) in tarot
- 50.1 percent ( $n = 1,977$ ) in pagan religions

Even though horror film is the genesis of the queer spectator’s interest in the horror genre, the queer ontological connection to horror develops over time and finds more outlets in other media. In other words, the queer love of horror bleeds into other arts and interests. Collectively, this data evidences that queers connect to the “horrific,” “haunted,” and “spooky” in myriad manifestations, with the majority of survey participants watching horror television, reading horror literature, experiencing haunted houses and places, celebrating Halloween, following horror on social media, being interested in witchcraft, and hooking into true crime.

3.6.11 Violence, Gore, and Tension

While queer spectators are not attracted to horror simply for the genre’s “obvious” elements such as jump scares and gore, they, nevertheless, are comfortable with the presence of many of these elements in the genre. The data evidences that the vast majority of queer spectators of horror watch films with tension, suspense, gore, and graphic physical violence. Queer spectators are “very comfortable” or “comfortable” with horror film’s common affects such as tension and/or suspense (94.3 percent), gore (78.6 percent), and graphic physical violence (76.7 percent). Specifically, 74.8 percent ( $n = 3,065$ ) of survey participants across all demographics declared being “very comfortable” with tension and/or suspense in horror films, with a further 19.5 percent ( $n = 799$ ) declaring to be “comfortable.”<sup>47</sup> 48.2 percent ( $n = 1,978$ ) of survey participants across all demographics report being “very comfortable” with gore in horror films and a further 30.4 percent ( $n = 1,246$ ) as “comfortable.”<sup>48</sup> 36.4 percent ( $n = 1,495$ ) of survey participants across all demographics state they are “very comfortable” with graphic physical violence in horror films, with a further 40.3 percent ( $n = 1,655$ ) selecting “comfortable.”<sup>49</sup> Conversely, a significant percentage of queer spectators both do not like horror for and are not comfortable with the presence of sexual violence. 41.8 percent ( $n = 1,714$ ) of survey participants are “not at all comfortable” with graphic sexual violence in horror films, and only 23.4 percent are “very comfortable” ( $n = 374$ ) or

---

<sup>47</sup> 4.7 percent ( $n = 192$ ) of horror-loving queers are “somewhat comfortable” and just 1 percent ( $n = 43$ ) are “not at all comfortable” with tension and/or suspense in horror films.

<sup>48</sup> 17.4 percent ( $n = 713$ ) of horror-loving queers are “somewhat comfortable” and 4 percent ( $n = 166$ ) are “not at all comfortable” with gore in horror films.

<sup>49</sup> 20.5 percent ( $n = 843$ ) of horror-loving queers are “somewhat comfortable” and 2.7 percent ( $n = 111$ ) are “not at all comfortable” with graphic physical violence in horror films.

“comfortable” ( $n = 588$ ) with graphic sexual violence.<sup>50</sup> I hypothesize that the element of sexual violence in horror film is not appealing or comfortable for queer spectators because of the prevalent and pervasive sexual or sexuality-related traumas queer people experience in cisheteronormative society, although a consequential number of queer spectators of horror use numerous generic elements, including graphic sexual violence, to work through trauma, a topic which will be addressed in Chapter 4.<sup>51</sup>

3.6.12 Horror Subgenres

	QUEER HORROR SPECTATORS	FEMALE HORROR FANS	QUEER HORROR SPECTATORS	FEMALE HORROR FANS
	LOVE / LIKE	LIKE ALL / MOST	HATE / DISLIKE	DISLIKE ALL / MOST
PSYCHOLOGICAL	93.2 ( $n = 2,812$ )	81.0 ( $n = 85$ )	1.5 ( $n = 62$ )	2.9 ( $n = 3$ )
SUPERNATURAL / OCCULT / GHOST	91.6 ( $n = 3,743$ )	85.7 ( $n = 90$ )	2.4 ( $n = 98$ )	2.9 ( $n = 3$ )
WITCHCRAFT	88.9 ( $n = 3,626$ )	68.3 ( $n = 71$ )	1.5 ( $n = 62$ )	7.7 ( $n = 8$ )
SCI-FI HORROR	86.4 ( $n = 3,531$ )	74.0 ( $n = 77$ )	3.2 ( $n = 133$ )	5.8 ( $n = 6$ )
MONSTER MOVIES	86.0 ( $n = 3,513$ )	55.8 ( $n = 58$ )	2.4 ( $n = 99$ )	13.5 ( $n = 14$ )
VAMPIRE	78.8 ( $n = 3,220$ )	92.4 ( $n = 97$ )	5.4 ( $n = 220$ )	1.0 ( $n = 1$ )
HORROR COMEDY OR PARODY	76.3 ( $n = 3,122$ )	59.4 ( $n = 63$ )	9.0 ( $n = 368$ )	21.7 ( $n = 23$ )
SERIAL KILLER	75.8 ( $n = 3,098$ )	53.3 ( $n = 56$ )	8.4 ( $n = 341$ )	24.8 ( $n = 26$ )
SLASHER	72.7 ( $n = 2,967$ )	25.0 ( $n = 25$ )	12.4 ( $n = 507$ )	54.0 ( $n = 54$ )
ZOMBIE / LIVING DEAD	70.7 ( $n = 2,887$ )	54.4 ( $n = 56$ )	11.7 ( $n = 480$ )	18.4 ( $n = 19$ )

FIGURE 3.14. Chart that compares the top 10 horror subgenres between this study’s survey participants and Brigid Cherry’s study of female horror fans.

Queer spectators can be understood, per this survey’s data, to not only be comfortable with a large number of horror’s generic elements, but also have enthusiastic engagement with a broad range of horror subgenres. This further evidences their fundamental passion for the genre as a whole, in contrast to findings from Cherry's study of female horror fans. Adam Scales notes about Cherry's (1999) findings that "female audiences favour more subtle horror forms such as the vampire or occult/supernatural over the more gory splatter counterparts" (2015, 186). Scales further suggests that "there is evidence to suggest that a substantial number of gay fans claim to consume . . . more 'serious' or hard-core forms of horror privileged by straight fans" (2015, 186). For his analysis, Scales analyzed gay online forum posts and comments, a netnographic method that can inadvertently privilege performative masculinity and thereby occlude the complete picture of the types of horror queers prefer.<sup>52</sup>

<sup>50</sup> 34.8 percent ( $n = 1,428$ ) of horror-loving queers are “somewhat comfortable” with graphic sexual violence in horror films.

<sup>51</sup> Narrator Velasco directly connects the therapeutic function of horror for him to a revenge film: “There was another horror film that really helped me with my trauma—as it relates to my sexual abuse—and it was I Spit on Your Grave, a revenge film where I saw the female protagonist get her revenge after being brutally attacked. I instantly connected to her and wished I could have done the same to my attackers. But not actually killing them. Just getting back at them” (2020, 16).

This project's survey, however, has found that queer horror fans love films from all subgenres of horror (see figure 3.14). Each survey participant was presented with options in order to select how much they like or dislike each of the 22 proffered horror categories/subgenres.<sup>53</sup> The following list accounts for the subgenres that the vast majority of queer spectators of horror love or like: psychological (93.2 percent), supernatural/occult/ghost (91.6 percent), witchcraft (88.9 percent), sci-fi horror (86.4 percent), monster movies (86 percent), vampire (78.8 percent), horror comedy or parody (76.3 percent), serial killer (75.8 percent), slasher (72.7 percent), zombie/living dead (70.7 percent), possession (69.3 percent), werewolf (67.8 percent), body horror (66 percent),<sup>54</sup> and Universal horror (64.4 percent). As such, the majority of queer spectators love or like 16 out of the 22 presented horror film subgenres, suggesting that the

---

<sup>52</sup> To evidence a more complete understanding of the queer cisgender man's horror tastes, this study's data demonstrates, in fact, that queer cisgender men "love" or "like" the "subtle" horror subgenres such as supernatural/occult/ghost (92.2 percent), vampire (77.4 percent), and witchcraft (89.6 percent), as well as the more "hard-core" subgenres such as slasher (84.2 percent) and extreme horror (47.8 percent).

<sup>53</sup> Each survey participant was asked to select up to five of their most loved horror film subgenres resulting in a weakened consensus because they were limited to five subgenres, which further demonstrates that the overall horror genre matters more than individual subgenres. The most selected categories/subgenres are psychological (58.2 percent), supernatural / occult / ghost (52 percent), sci-fi horror (36.6 percent), slasher (35.1 percent), witchcraft (28.9 percent), horror comedy or parody (27.2 percent), monster movies (26.5 percent), body horror (26.2 percent), serial killer (24.6 percent), zombie / living dead (21.7 percent). Only a single subgenre—rape revenge—received a majority consensus for most hated horror film subgenres at 61.1 percent ( $n = 2,374$ ).

<sup>54</sup> The survey results show that transgender participants are more inclined to enjoy the body horror subgenre. 54.8 percent of transgender women and 49.6 percent of transgender men "love" body horror, compared with 34.2 percent of cisgender women and 34 percent of cisgender men. One survey participant adds pertinent commentary to these data results: "Being transgender, I think that a lot of body horror stuff resonates differently with me compared to cis people" (46935030). This data evidences an area of queer horror studies that transgender scholars could further, critically providing theoretical and embodied perspectives.

queer relationship to horror encompasses most horror subgenres. Only rape revenge films had more survey participants who hate or dislike the subgenre (45.6 percent) than those who love or like it (22.5 percent). Although a love for various horror subgenres is not exclusive to queer horror fans, the survey data indicates that queers experience a distinctly queer connection. A brief analysis of the top three most beloved subgenres—psychological, supernatural/occult/ghost, and witchcraft films—elucidates how queers may relate to the subgenres differently. For example, people with nonconforming sexualities and genders have a long history of being psychologically pathologized,<sup>55</sup> and coming to terms with one’s queerness can be an internal psychological battle. Therefore, queer people find a connection to films that present psychological horrors as an outlet for the exploration of their traumas. When Darryl Jones points out that “ghosts are time out of joint” (2018, 80), he inadvertently highlights a queer temporality exhibited by supernatural and ghost films, a temporality that may resonate differently for queer film spectators who embody an existence outside the norm, including some rituals and institutions reinforced through religious traditions. As such, witchcraft is antecedent to institutional religion and, as Cynthia Barounis explains, “has long been associated with queer sexual deviance and feminist rebellion” (2018, 232). Queers seemingly connect to these three beloved horror subgenres—psychological, supernatural/occult/ghost, and witchcraft—in decisively queer ways through their nonnormative consciousness, sense of time, and embodied resistance.

While Benshoff and Griffin determine that the “vampire film has been especially meaningful to queer spectators” (2006, 76) and numerous scholars have analyzed the vampire as queer (Christopher Craft, Sue-Ellen Case, Richard Dyer, Bonnie Zimmerman, Xavier Aldana Reyes, Sorcha Ní Fhlainn, etc.), queer spectators do not exhibit a strong preference for vampire films over other horror subgenres. Queer horror fans also have a stronger favorable opinion of most horror film categories/subgenres than the female horror participants in Cherry's study, with the exception of vampire films (Cherry's data shows women like these at a higher percentage than the queer spectator). Since vampire films were "by far the most popular type of horror film" in Cherry's study, with 92.4 percent of female horror fans liking all or most vampire films, the segmentation of the data from cis women, cis men, trans women, trans men, genderqueer women, and genderqueer men who selected only a single gender identity was analyzed to determine if women do indeed much prefer vampire films (1999, 88). This study's results show nominal differences, with 80.3 percent of cis women ( $n = 1,077$ ), 77.4 percent of cis men ( $n = 934$ ), 79.5 percent of trans women ( $n = 116$ ), 74.2 percent of trans men ( $n = 247$ ), 80.8 percent of genderqueer women ( $n = 235$ ), and 82.7 percent of genderqueer men ( $n = 158$ ) loving or liking vampire films. This data establishes that horror-loving queers, inclusive of queer women, are distinct from the mostly heterosexual female respondents of Cherry's study (1999, 149), with female horror fans being more ardent lovers of vampire films. Moreover, the vast majority of queer horror fans, across the gender spectrum, love or like supernatural/occult/ghost films. Carol Clover speculates "that occult films have a greater share of female viewers than other sorts of horror (there are no reliable statistics)" (1992, 65). The same gender breakdown, again, shows nominal gendered differences, with 92.3 percent of cis women ( $n = 1,238$ ), 92.2 percent of cis men ( $n = 1,113$ ), 82.9 percent of trans women ( $n = 121$ ), 85.6 percent of trans men ( $n = 285$ ), 90.4 percent of genderqueer women ( $n = 263$ ), and 90.1 percent of genderqueer men ( $n = 172$ ) loving or liking supernatural/occult/ghost films.<sup>56</sup> These statistics evidence that queer women indeed love or like supernatural/occult/ghost films, affirming Clover's speculation; however, this study's data overall demonstrates that all queers love or like supernatural/occult/ghost films.

---

<sup>55</sup> In 1973, the American Psychiatric Association (APA) removed homosexuality as a “psychiatric disorder” from the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders DSM-II, with it instead being downgraded to a “Sexual Orientation Disturbance” and then, in 1980, to “Ego Dystonic Homosexuality,” until it was fully eradicated from the DSM in 1987. In 2013, the APA revised the diagnosis of “gender identity disorder” to “gender dysphoria” for DSM-5, the current manual. However, currently, the World Health Organization’s International Statistical Classification of Diseases and Related Health Problems 10th Revision 2019 (ICD-10) lists “egodystonic sexual orientation” as one of the “psychological and behavioural disorders associated with sexual development and orientation,” and describes the condition as one in which “the gender identity or sexual preference (heterosexual, homosexual, bisexual, or prepubertal) is not in doubt, but the individual wishes it were different because of associated psychological and behavioural disorders, and may seek treatment in order to change it.”

Theoretical and empirical research heretofore has most often placed the emphasis on determining the maleness and youthfulness of the slasher audience; however, this study's survey data indicates that there is no correlation between age<sup>57</sup> and loving or liking slasher films ( $p < .193$ ).<sup>58</sup> Historical documentation shows that women have long enjoyed slashers; indeed, Aljean Harmetz, Hollywood correspondent of The New York Times, reported in 1980 that 45 percent of the audience for canon slashers Halloween and Friday the 13th were teenagers (12-17) that “breaks down as 45 percent male and 55 percent female” (C15). Yet previous scholarship focused on data that demonstrates (assumed cisheterosexual) women do not like slasher films. For example, in Cherry’s study, “the most disliked horror film type is the slasher film of which 54 percent of the respondents who express a preference dislike all or most examples of the type” (1999, 88). However, this study’s data on queer spectator’s preferences for slasher film shows that 68.7 percent of cis women ( $n = 921$ ), 84.2 percent of cis men ( $n = 1,016$ ), 61 percent of trans women ( $n = 89$ ), 67.9 percent of trans men ( $n = 226$ ), 67.7 percent of genderqueer women ( $n = 197$ ), and 73.3 percent of genderqueer men ( $n = 140$ ) love or like slasher films. While cis men show a preference for slasher films, this project’s survey data indicates that not only the large majority of cis, trans, and genderqueer women love or like slashers, but also only 15.1 percent of cis women, 19.2 percent of trans women, and 16.8 percent of genderqueer women hate or dislike slashers, which further demonstrates a distinct difference between queer horror fans and the (assumed) cisheterosexual subjects of prior empirical research. The subgenre of witchcraft films reveals a nominal difference between the two cisgender identities, with 91.7 percent of cis women ( $n = 1,230$ ) and 89.6 percent of cis men ( $n = 1,081$ ) loving or liking witchcraft films. Regardless of gender binary or cisgender comparisons or dissensions, collectively the majority of queer horror spectators have a broad and collective love or like of most horror categories and subgenres.

---

<sup>56</sup> Looking at the combined gender categories of women and men, both love or like supernatural/occult/ghost films exactly the same, at 88.9 percent.

3.6.13 The Favorite Horror Films of Queer Spectators

As is the case with the queer spectator’s penchant for a wide range of horror subgenres, a review of queer spectators’ favorite horror films reveals that, while

---

<sup>57</sup> Since there were only eight survey participants who were 60-65 years old and three who were 66+, those age categories were removed from SPSS calculations both to meet the assumptions for utilizing a chi-square and to not overrepresent those two age categories based on only 11 survey participants.

<sup>58</sup> Since the first slashers appeared decades ago, a longitudinal examination of slashers is now relevant and, unmistakably, the generation reared on slashers continue to connect with the subgenre.

there is some generalized consensus of beloved horror films, the queer relationship to the horror genre takes precedence over individual films, as survey participants report a great deal of variability in their favorite horror films (see figure 3.15). Stated differently, queers distinctively and explicitly connect with the horror genre, yet that connection is fostered and maintained in innumerable ways, and is not based or centered on queer horror films. While the top 25 favorite films are a combination of horror canon and recent successes, the diverse list includes films from many eras across six decades, multiple subgenres, and numerous production countries. This constitution of a “favorites” list is typical, as Alice M. Mitchell, who completed a groundbreaking empirical audience study in the 1920s, explains: “From the data gathered from the 10,052 children for the present study it seems apparent that the kind of movie a child likes best and the ones which stand out most vividly in his mind are of two classes: those which he recently has seen and those large, important films” (Mitchell quoted in Fleming 2016, 133). My data substantiates this determination, demonstrating a very similar human proclivity. Horror certainly has an established canon, with a collection of established and commonly beloved films. The survey participants’ lists of 25 favorite horror films reflect a collected mix of those established and beloved canonical horror films, such as Halloween and The Shining, alongside recent commercial or critical horror successes, such as Get Out and The Babadook.<sup>59</sup> This is replicated with the female horror fans who completed Cherry’s survey; the favorite film list is a combination of horror canon, such as Psycho and Night of the Living Dead, and then-recent productions, such as Interview with the Vampire and Bram Stoker’s Dracula (1999, 243). When asked to list their favorite horror films, an average of 3,774 queer participants responded, making a final list of 18,870 films.<sup>60</sup> This list features nearly 1,500 different and diverse international horror films from every era, demonstrating that the complete list of queer spectators’ favorite horror films is much more idiosyncratic than the top 25 favorite films indicate.

---

<sup>59</sup> The vast majority of participants had already completed the survey when Midsommar was released on July 3, 2019, and It: Chapter Two was released after the survey closed. I note these two films because, being recent commercial/critical successes, each film could have entered the top 25 had the survey timing been different.

<sup>60</sup> Survey participants were given five separate open-text fields to list their favorite horror films, though not all were required to be filled in. Therefore, field one received 3,886 responses, field two received 3,869 responses, field three received 3,839 responses, field four received 3,710 responses, and field five received 3,566 responses. This response rate averages out to 3,774 participants for the entire question.

The large number of films listed, however, did not lead to needing much consensus to determine the top of the list. Alien obtained the number one favorite film slot for queer spectators because 670 survey participants listed Alien as a favorite film. This constitutes 17.8 percent consensus on the favorite horror film; contrariwise, 82.3 percent of survey participants did not choose Alien as their favorite horror film, further indicating that specific films matter less than the entire horror genre. To further evidence the argument that individual horror films do not stand out over the genre as a whole for queer spectators, I examined the data from five mutually exclusive<sup>61</sup> gender identities through a tabulation of the top five favorite horror film lists for cis women ( $n = 1,257$ ), cis men ( $n = 1,165$ ), trans women ( $n = 105$ ), trans men ( $n = 207$ ), and non-binary ( $n = 356$ ) survey participants (see figure 3.16). The number one favorite film slot for each of the five gender identity groupings was determined by a low minority of responses, with an average of only 22.3 percent consensus needed to reach the number one favorite horror film for that gender identity.<sup>62</sup> These results further support the conclusion that queer spectators share a large consensus in their love for the horror genre, but not for specific films.

The range in era and subgenre for the top 25 favorite horror films for survey participants additionally indicates the holistic and far-reaching passion queer spectators have for the horror genre. The top 25 films are predominantly US<sup>63</sup> modern<sup>64</sup> horror films that are not explicitly queer. The top favorite horror film list accurately reflects queer horror fans' favorite subgenres, representing psychological, supernatural/occult/ghost, sci-fi horror, slasher, witchcraft films, and so on. The nominal variation in survey participants' favorite horror films further indicates that the queer connection to horror exists at the generic level.

---

<sup>61</sup> For these calculations, I examined the cis women, cis men, trans women, trans men, and non-binary participants who selected one gender identity.

<sup>62</sup> The percentages that determined the number one favorite film across those five gender identities are as follows: 14.5 percent consensus of cis women, 24.8 percent consensus of cis men, 39 percent consensus of trans women, 15.7 percent consensus of trans men, and 17.4 percent consensus of nonbinary participants.

<sup>63</sup> Suspiria (1977) is the one foreign language film featured in the top 25.

<sup>64</sup> Reynold Humphries in The American Horror Film: An Introduction writes: "One word can sum up the shift from classic to modern horror: Psycho" (2002, 85). The Top 25 list features Psycho alongside other post-Psycho films.

Rank	Film	Count
1	Alien (1979)	670
2	Halloween (1978)	604
3	Scream (1996)	484
4	Hereditary (2018)	465
5	A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984)	450
6	Get Out (2017)	413
7	The Thing (1982)	409
8	The Exorcist (1973)	357
9	The Witch (2015)	326
10	The Shining (1980)	311
11	The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974)	295
12	Hellraiser (1987)	292
13	Suspiria (1977)	291
14	The Conjuring (2013)	274
15	It (2017)	237
16	The Silence of the Lambs (1991)	235
17	The Cabin in the Woods (2011)	222
18	Us (2019)	221
19	It Follows (2014)	210
20	The Babadook (2014)	206
21	The Evil Dead (1981)	179
22	Friday the 13th (1980)	169
23	Carrie (1976)	162
24	The Descent (2005)	158
25	Psycho (1960)	156

FIGURE 3.15. Chart that displays survey participants' top 25 favorite horror films.

Cis Women (n = 1,257)	Cis Men (n = 1,165)
Alien	Halloween
Get Out	Alien
Hereditary	Scream
Scream	A Nightmare on Elm Street
Halloween	The Exorcist
A Nightmare on Elm Street	Hereditary
The Witch	The Texas Chain Saw Massacre
The Exorcist	Suspiria
The Shining	The Thing
The Thing	Hellraiser

Trans Women (n = 105)	Trans Men (n = 207)	Non-Binary (n = 356)
Alien	The Thing	Alien
The Thing	Hereditary	Get Out
Get Out	Alien	Halloween
Hereditary	Get Out	The Thing
Hellraiser	A Nightmare on Elm Street	Hereditary
Suspiria	Halloween	Scream
Evil Dead II	The Texas Chain Saw Massacre	Us
The Witch	Scream	The Witch
Us	Us	The Exorcist
The Babadook (3-way tie)	The Conjuring (3-way tie)	It
It Follows (3-way tie)	Hellraiser (3-way tie)
The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (3-way tie)	Friday the 13th (3-way tie)

FIGURE 3.16. Chart that presents survey participants' top 10 favorite horror films, delineated by gender identity.

The fact that the top 25 films range across six decades speaks to the power of the horror canon and, as cultural critic Mark Fisher explains, demonstrates that “the very distinction between past and present is breaking down. In 1981, the 1960s seemed much further away than they do today. Since then, cultural time has folded back on itself, and the impression of linear development has given way to a strange simultaneity” (2014, 9).<sup>65</sup> This simultaneity is fostered by having unparalleled access to horror films from the past (and the present) through repertory theatres, streaming services, peer-to-peer sharing, and distributors such as Arrow Films and Vinegar Syndrome. Queer horror fans embrace horror films from as far back as the 1920s with alacrity and facility, showing engagement with a range of eras as well as subgenres, and evidence that their passion for the horror genre is not solely connected to or held by specific horror films.<sup>66</sup>

3.7 Summarizing the Queer Spectator of Horror Film

This chapter has presented the most significant data-led analysis of the opinions, habits, and tastes of the queer horror spectator, providing the most comprehensive portrait of queer horror spectators to date. The mixed-method data presented in this chapter additionally explicates how the queer horror fan’s relationship to the horror genre is distinguished from previously documented data on horror audiences. The data demonstrates a diverse queer horror spectatorship and, in so doing, simultaneously challenges the focus of previous theoretical and empirical scholarship on white cis men and establishes an extensive picture of queer horror spectatorship. This study’s survey participants (whose extensive data can be extrapolated to the larger queer horror spectator population) indeed span ages, races, ethnicities, gender identities, sexual orientations, and borders. It can be concluded, then, that queer spectators merit increased recognition and integration into horror studies. This study creates a permanent space for queer spectators in horror fandom and studies, much as Cherry forged a space for the female horror fan in academic discourse by composing their first empirical profile, convincingly establishing that “women have always enjoyed horror and continue to do so” (1999, 20). As this study argues, queer horror fans, regardless of specific intersectional identities, share many more similarities than differences, not only deserving but warranting extrication from generalized demographic profiles of horror fans—both theoretical and empirical. This study’s mixed-method data indicates that the opinions, habits, and tastes of horror-loving queers do not map directly onto existing data. This means that queer horror fans exist outside of documented sources and, therefore, have a distinctive relationship with the genre. The queer horror fan is a knowledgeable and active spectator—a spectator who understands themselves to have a queer lens that uniquely shapes their relationship to horror. Queer spectators of horror are a highly educated population who knowledgeably, reflectively, reflexively, and insightfully engage with the horror genre. While Cherry affirms that “the horror film audience has always been regarded as completely Other” (1999, 4), queer horror fans are further marginalized in horror fandom due to their queerness, as they are in society. Moreover, the majority of queer horror fans experience additional marginalization due to gender identity and/or race.

---

<sup>65</sup> Even though Fisher links this collapsed cultural simultaneity to the neoliberal (post-Fordist) refashioning of society—including time—to its own end, his perceptive observation holds resonance and application beyond a political context or a specifically Marxist reading of culture.

<sup>66</sup> In part, the queer horror fan interest in 1920s and 1930s horror may be attributed to the draw of films by queer directors F. W. Murnau and James Whale.

Kim Newman acknowledges that “few areas of cinema depend so much on the loyalty and inside knowledge of their audience” as the horror genre (Newman quoted in Cherry 1999, 33), an argument that particularly applies to queer spectators. Specifically, queer fandom is built on a loyalty to and inside knowledge about horror films that decodes and addresses the genre’s queerness. A survey participant underscores this when they write: “I think the LGBT+ community regularly bonds more with villains due to their queer coding throughout cinema history” (47123425). Queerness itself is an embodied subjectivity steeped in both acute and insidious trauma, both historical and active. Horror films are anchored in expressions of physical and psychological trauma, experiences to which many queers directly relate; as a survey participant notes, “the tropes of repression, desire, fear and trauma that are manifest within horror can be applied to LGBTIQ+ experiences” (47083771). The queer experience of “surviving the trauma of living in the closet and being an out queer person casts a different light on [horror] films” (46973195), a light from which queers can turn trauma into a joyous rage expressed through camp sensibility. Camp is a queer insider language and lens that the vast majority of queer spectators of horror employ in their enjoyment of the genre. The camp connection to horror has rarely been examined even though, as narrator Michael Varrati notes, “camp and horror walk hand-in-hand because they’re both arts of heightened reality” (2020, 6).<sup>67</sup> Chapter 4, therefore, provides an in-depth analytical examination of trauma and camp within horror spectatorship, anchored by the presentation of corresponding mixed-method data that explicates these uniquely queer experiences with and relationships to horror.

---

<sup>67</sup> This dearth of in-depth analysis on the connections between camp and the horror genre is particularly glaring considering that Jack Babuscio wrote in 1977: “The horror genre, in particular, is susceptible to a camp interpretation” (43; italics in the original).

Chapter 4

Trauma and Camp: Queer Connections to Horror

I'm able to bring the added perspective that oppression brings and therefore don't just take horror at face value. It's not always just entertainment, sometimes it's a way to escape real life trauma because you're able to be like while even though my rights are being hoisted away at least I'm not fighting undead werewolves from hell (47564845).

Horror is very inherently about trauma (47079311).

Camp is the element of horror that is exactly what I love about the genre and is probably what I consciously try to take from all of my favorite films. Camp is the thing that is making it really, really interesting to me because it's this fantastical—not trapped by any sort of boundary—loud, visual, and, hopefully quite garish celebration of art and creativity. Camp is a proudness in existing really loudly and boldly (Thompson 2020, 20).

I think camp is queerness and horror is queerness. They're both tackling the same thing. They're both dismantling society. Camp is taking it and amplifying it and horror is taking it and throwing blood on it—but someone's laughing while throwing that bucket. It's all interwoven (Davis 2020, 31).

Chapter 1 analyzes the ontological and theoretical queer nature of the horror genre, providing a foundation for the expositional Chapter 3 to present the most complete understanding to date of the queer horror spectator's opinions, habits, and tastes. This chapter explicates further the distinct queer relationship to horror evidenced through the expansion and analysis of trauma and camp,<sup>1</sup> two different yet linked fundamental aspects to the queer connection to the genre. The intersections between trauma, camp, horror, and queer studies have yet to be critically considered. This study's mixed-method data evidences that queer trauma and camp are deeply entwined in queers' relationship to their understanding and enjoyment of horror, which further establishes the queer spectator's sui generis relationship with the genre. This chapter, then, explicates horror's mediation of trauma for the queer spectator and queer spectators'

---

<sup>1</sup> As with the definition of horror itself, this study does not mediate varied definitions and individual understandings of camp because of the idiosyncratic nature of camp relationships to cultural productions. Specifically, this study does not explicate camp distinctions in different horror films, even though individual queer spectators may distinguish between parody horror such as The Rocky Horror Picture Show (1975), contemporary queer camp horror such as The Gay Bed and Breakfast of Terror (2007) or The Perfection (2018), and traditional horror, especially the type that may be "campily" consumed now due to historic distance such as Bela Lugosi's and Dwight Frye's performances in Dracula (1931).

employment of camp in their relationship to horror as a trauma processor, as well as expands the trauma cinema and camp theory canons to include the horror genre.

4.1 Connecting Trauma and the Horror Genre

This chapter first investigates the yet considered convergence between the fields of trauma studies, horror studies, and queer studies (including queer audiences). Scholars in trauma and trauma cinema studies have mainly focused on analyzing historical and experimental films, while horror studies discourse has largely circumvented engaging empirical audience studies and considering the queer spectator when investigating trauma. The goal of this study is to analyze how queer trauma finds expression through the horror genre and to connect it to existing trauma theory. Two examples are the work of Adam Lowenstein, in Shocking Representation: Historical Trauma, National Cinema, and the Modern Horror Film (2005), and Linnie Blake, in The Wounds of Nations: Horror Cinema, Historical Trauma and National Identity (2008), who analyze horror in the context of (repressed) national traumas, with both effectively arguing that horror reflects back significant moments of political and social crisis. In addressing the cultural work of horror, Lowenstein and Blake connect the representational to the traumatic. In other words, horror allegorically and metaphorically reflects repressed societal concerns. Lowenstein adopts a Benjaminian standpoint and Blake a culturalist and historicist framework to argue persuasively for the healing power of horror—the “most traumatic and traumatised of film genres” (Blake 2008, 1). Uniquely, this study builds on and extends that scholarship to recognize and analyze the therapeutic power of horror for the queer spectator, who forges an active connection to horror.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>2</sup> While this study centers the active and conscious connections made by queer spectators about the “healing” elements of horror, I acknowledge that this understanding might not always be consciously the case. Significantly and undoubtedly, the therapeutic powers of horror may be sought by some spectators unconsciously. Some queer spectators might not be aware that there is a connection between their queer embodiment and their horror consumption, whereas others do not only watch horror for the explicit aim of horror’s therapeutic function, even if this aftereffect is plausible. This study does not propose that all queer spectators consciously consume horror as a form of therapy for healing purposes, nor does it suggest that horror’s therapeutic powers are the singular reason for generic consumption. I argue, instead, that horror films can function therapeutically for queer spectators because the genre distinctively resonates with queer trauma—and that a substantial portion of horror-loving queers consciously engage with horror therapeutically.

I consider and analyze both the survey data and oral history interviews to discuss why and how queer spectators connect with horror because of the trauma(s) experienced by queer people and displayed through the horror genre, ultimately underscoring the generic potentials of horror and demonstrating that queers use the genre therapeutically to alleviate trauma. Even though individuals experience and respond to trauma differently, this study's mixed-method data evidences queer people's shared therapeutic connection to horror, establishing that one's queerness creates a connection to the horror genre in which horror films function as one form of cathartic therapy. This study argues for and empirically demonstrates a distinctively queer cathartic emotional pressure release/relief from queer trauma, with the horror genre functioning as the valve, and, therefore, presents a new dimension to previous theorizations of trauma, catharsis, and the horror genre. Popularized by Aristotle and Freud, cathartic "purges" or "releases" have been topics of thought, theory, and/or application for thousands of years. Whilst this study engages catharsis theory, it actively disengages itself entirely from the ideological uses that the Freudian model puts forth, not least by Freud himself. This disengagement is due to not only the misogynistic and homophobic legacy of psychoanalytic practice, but also, and especially, the significant percentage of the survey participants who are conscious of the ways in which horror film engages their queer trauma (which is opposed to the Freudian catharsis model's basis on unconscious or the more generalized subconscious). This study's theoretical underpinnings understand catharsis as a subjective emotional processing of "an individual's built-up negative feelings (e.g., anger, sadness) [that] can be processed effectively and safely through the use of purging activities (Jackson, 1994). Such activities might include any courses of action that actively engage with and then subsequently dispel these negative feelings" (Stark 2021, 4). This study, then, examines a specifically queer catharsis: the processing of insidious queer trauma, which is consciously recognized by the queer spectators themselves, through the horror genre.<sup>3</sup> As explained by a queer spectator:

---

<sup>3</sup> To further clarify this study's definition of catharsis, I follow Thomas Scheff and Don Bushnell who state that "catharsis is a subjective experience manifested by certain external signals such as laughter and crying, and by subjective feelings of tension and of other emotions" (1984, 262). Much like horror, queerness, and trauma, I do not place strict parameters around the research participants' use of the term "catharsis" or potential understanding of any catharsis theory. Queer spectators of horror seek catharsis in the genre in order to cope with the daily insidious trauma of the cisheteropatriarchy. In other words, queers are cognizant of what traumatizes us horror is “a way for me to process the very real trauma and violence I have experienced for my [queer] identity” (47202774). Incontrovertibly, trauma is an interrelation between queerness and the horror genre since “horror films, like queer people, often understand and convey the perspective of living with trauma” (46826850). My decision to evidence empirically the positive effects of horror for queer spectators is bolstered by Mathias Clasen affirming that “the negative psychological effects of horror are much better documented in the research literature than are the positive effects” (2017, 61).<sup>4</sup> Despite trauma’s “resistance to narrativization, trauma demands to be spoken, and this leads to creative and sometimes unconscious attempts to communicate traumatic experience” (Westengard 2019, 180). Following Laura Westengard, I argue for a creative queer spectatorship born from traumatic queer experiences, which actively finds outlets in the trauma narratives of the horror genre. Hence, this study bends and extends Westengard’s theory that queer cultural production invokes and evokes the tropes of gothic horror to express trauma by applying it to the queer spectator’s creative, cathartic, and camp engagement with horror that is informed by insidious trauma.

In Gothic Queer Culture: Marginalized Communities and the Ghosts of Insidious Trauma (2019), Westengard argues that “trauma is integral to the connection between the queer and the [G]othic, and gothicism itself is a way of queering trauma” (2019, 26). In Chapter 1, I explicated the affective and thematic connections between the Gothic and horror, and I here apply Westengard’s argument to horror film to argue that trauma is integral to the connection between queers and the horror genre. In fact, Westengard’s theory underpins my argument that the queer connection to horror is partially informed by trauma. Westengard demonstrates how queers turn to gothicism to navigate and express trauma, determining that queer culture is inherently Gothic.

Whereas Westengard centers on literary analysis and queer cultural production, and horror enables an acting out and recognition of that trauma in a safe space with, perhaps, an alternative ending.

---

<sup>4</sup> Even though, as noted, this study prioritizes horror’s positive effects for queer spectators, the mixed-method data indisputably establishes that blatant homophobia, transphobia, misogyny, and/or racism in horror films is traumatic for some queer spectators, prompting them to have selective engagement with the genre and to eschew those types of films. Moreover, this study intentionally disengages with case studies that document the connection between horror spectatorship and cinematic neurosis or psychosis (see James C. Bozzuto 1975; James W. Hamilton 1978; Jeffrey M. Turley and Andre P. Derdeyn 1990; Bruce Ballon and Molyn Leszcz 2007).

this study focuses on the queer connection with the horror genre as one form of traumatic expression. Moreover, Westengard points out that “creative production is an inherent byproduct of trauma” (2019, 190), not only highlighting the queer trauma that is integral to both our creative and academic cultural productions,<sup>5</sup> but also allowing for the creativity in the queer spectator’s reception of horror films.<sup>6</sup> To understand the drive behind the queer spectator’s creative engagement with the horror genre, it is important to explicate what “queer trauma” means and how this study engages with this queer trauma.

4.2 Establishing Queer Trauma

Trauma can be individual, collective, cultural, national, historical, intergenerational, or insidious; in fact, due to the pervasiveness of trauma, “our entire global culture is sometimes characterized as traumatic or post-traumatic” (Davis and Meretoja 2020, 1). While this study is specifically focused on the insidious societal traumas that harm queers, a focus on trauma that is specifically queer should not be understood as a process of universalizing traumas across the queer spectrum. An individual’s intersectionality shapes their own experiences of trauma, as trauma itself is prioritized based on hierarchies of race, gender, sexuality, class, and ability as established and perpetuated by the white cisheteropatriarchy.<sup>7</sup> Marginalized people are further traumatized by the reality that “being recognized as traumatized is a privilege not equally available to all trauma victims” (Davis and Meretoja 2020, 5). Moreover, essentializing trauma for a diverse spectrum of community members should be undertaken carefully because, as Jillian C. Rogers states, it is “axiomatic that each person’s trauma is different, and that how they experience, perform, and cope with trauma will vary based on myriad factors” (2021, 10).

---

<sup>5</sup> Trauma is idiosyncratic and manifests innumerable creative production outputs; in my case, this study is a byproduct of my embodied queer trauma. This study exists because I sought to understand how my life-long connection with horror is entwined with the traumas caused to me from living in a homophobic, binaristic, and misogynistic society. This study and document exist in their current forms in part due to a shared global trauma, having been partially conducted and entirely written during the globally traumatic COVID-19 pandemic—a pandemic that has disproportionately harmed and further traumatized the queer community, most especially the BIPOC and/or trans* members of the community.

<sup>6</sup> Similarly, Rommi Smith and Jenni Molloy discuss “the idea that creativity is one of many strategic responses to trauma” (2019, 209).

<sup>7</sup> Future investigations in this field should specifically continue to examine empirically how women, BIPOC, differently abled, and/or economically disadvantaged people use horror to heal from the traumas of misogyny, white supremacy, ableism, and capitalism/classism.

Queer trauma demands ongoing recognition and expression due to the continual development of queer subjectivity through the psychological and physical tolls of overt and insidious trauma. Fundamental both to understanding queers' trauma and to "queering" trauma, as Kevin L. Nadal argues, "is to ensure that trauma is conceptualized through queer lenses—meaning that people are not limited to simple or rigid definitions of trauma" (2020, 50). Previously defined or understood trauma theories may not fully explain or represent the queer experience because, historically, trauma and its therapies have been filtered through the cisheteronormative lens.

While trauma studies and theory is built upon the foundation of psychoanalytic thought, this study is not concerned with the pathologization of or institutionalized treatments for trauma, nor is it concerned with detailing the history of trauma theories such as Oppenheim's "traumatic neuroses" (1889), Jean-Martin Charcot's "traumatic hysteria" (1889), or Peirre Janet's theory of "dissociation" (1889), nor trauma studies' extension into the humanities by scholars such as Felman (1992), Laub (1992), and Caruth (1996). Since bibliographic citations are ideologically driven, they function as a form of academic politics; therefore, as I have discussed, I intentionally diverge and disengage from direct engagement with Freud and the field of psychoanalysis due to the harm psychoanalysis has inflicted on marginalized people for decades, particularly its pathologization of homosexuality. This study, moreover, does not engage with the psychoanalytic lens in part because of the misogyny at the root of its origin. In fact, as Judith Herman critically states: "Out of the ruins of the traumatic theory of hysteria, Freud created psychoanalysis. The dominant psychological theory of the next century was founded in the denial of women's reality" (2015, 14). Yet, it must be acknowledged that the queer spectator's horror-healing paradigm holds connection to Freudian and post-Freudian scholarship that deploys particular Freudian conceptions of the basic mechanisms of repression and catharsis, which are found in horror narratives through its themes, representation, and affect. Psychoanalytic discourse as deployed in the humanities may then provide the critic with an engaging lexicon of terms that can be utilized to investigate queer subjectivity and its generic identifications. However, such use does not imply adherence to the homophobic and misogynistic ideology that, I maintain, underpins psychoanalysis itself. This empirical study is not based in a “theoretical discussion of trauma’s artistic representations” (Lowenstein 2005, 4); therefore, this study privileges the understanding of trauma as “socioculturally constituted” over the “psychological considerations” that tend to dominate the field (Rogers 2021, 9). My contention remains, accordingly, that queer spectators explicitly connect the representational traumas of the horror genre to the traumas of their embodied queer experience.

Cisheteronormative society traumatizes queer individuals, leading to a queer trauma that is simultaneously personal, political, collective, and historical. Queer existence is submerged in “compulsory heterosexuality” (1980), as coined by Adrienne Rich, which is traumatic to queer individuals because nonnormative “individuals living in the heteronormative regime need to learn to conform, ignore, and banish their suffering to survive” (Yep 2003, 19). While many members of the queer community endure acute traumas, all queers suffer from insidious trauma and, indeed, this trauma is a part of queer culture itself.<sup>8</sup> This insidious trauma is identified and defined by Maria Root as one that is “associated with the social status of an individual being devalued because a characteristic intrinsic to their identity is different from what is valued by those in power, for example, gender, color, sexual orientation, physical ability” (1992, 240). To exist simply as queer in a cisheteronormative world means daily encounters with dehumanization, microaggressions, presumptions, and prejudices. In other words, all marginalized individuals experience insidious trauma, with BIPOC and/or trans* members of the queer community experiencing not only compounding intersectional traumas but also hate crimes at significantly higher rates since “LGBTQ people of color are consistently more likely to be targeted for anti-LGBTQ hate crimes” (Nadal 2020, 46).<sup>9</sup> For queer people, again particularly BIPOC, the concomitant “insidious trauma is constant and everywhere yet largely unacknowledged and invalidated, creating a cycle of insidious trauma in which the refusal to acknowledge experiences as traumatic serves as its own form of insidious trauma” (Westengard 2019, 180). Having traumatic experiences, whether post-traumatic or ongoing, dismissed or not acknowledged is further trauma, perpetuating a trauma loop.

---

<sup>8</sup> One example of the queer community acknowledging and embracing our shared trauma is a cultural event called “Glitter + Trauma,” a “queer wave party for gothic boys, indie girls and sissy punks” (<https://www.facebook.com/glittertrauma/>).

<sup>9</sup> BIPOC and/or trans* members of the queer community experience traumatic violence at higher rates than white and/or cisgender queer people. “The National Coalition of Antiviolence Programs (NCAVP), in their 2018 annual report, the latest year for which data are available, states that in 2017, there was a 21-year high in the number of LGBTQ hate-motivated homicides (NCAVP 2018). People of color comprised 71 percent of all LGBTQ victims, and transgender or gender-nonconforming people comprised 52 percent of all LGBTQ victims. As in the previous five years, the most common victim of an LGBTQ hate-motivated crime was a transgender woman of color” (Mooney, Clever, and Van Willigen 2021, 432).

“Insidious trauma’s effects are cumulative” (Root 1992, 240) and “trauma is both event and condition” (Rutherford 2013, 100), with insidious trauma escaping attachment to a single event and being an ongoing condition. The cumulative effects of a shared queer trauma are apparent, given evidence such as the queer community being disproportionately affected by mental illness. Further, the “stigma and shame” of being queer, “as well as the many expressed and unexpressed hostilities encountered on a daily basis,” all cause members of the queer community to experience higher levels of depression, anxiety, substance abuse, and suicide; in fact, “LGBT+ individuals are nearly three times more likely than straight, cisgender individuals to experience depression, anxiety, or substance abuse” (Alexander et al. 2021, 352). Other statistics further evidence the individual, familial, and social cost of the strict enforcement of cisheteronormativity on queer people: “The risk for suicide is also increased, with one study finding gay and lesbian individuals twice as likely to consider suicide, bisexual individuals at about three times the risk, and transgender individuals more than 13 times more likely to consider suicide than straight, cisgender individuals” (Alexander et al. 2021, 352). The trauma the cisheteronormative system causes in queer individuals results in increased mental health disorders and suicidality and in a collective, persistent traumatic state of existence for this nonnormative community.<sup>10</sup>

Each queer individual experiences, understands, and reacts to insidious trauma in their own singular way, yet this research recognizes a sharedness in the queer traumatic experience and connects it to a common expression—an active queer spectatorship of horror film. This notion of active spectatorship as a part of queer trauma is found in Susannah Radstone’s postulation that trauma theory has the “capacity to consolidate work on displacing models of passive spectatorship” (de Bruyn 2014, 7). Radstone states that “trauma could revise theories of spectatorship by considering the relations between fantasy, memory, temporality and the subject” (quoted in de Bruyn 2014, 7). In other words, analyzing the connection between queer trauma and the horror genre reveals the active queer spectatorship.

---

<sup>10</sup> Queer trauma may be unacknowledged or unknown by an individual for a long time or even indefinitely. For example, a queer person may be unaware that they have internalized homophobia, which is both a manifestation and a perpetuation of queer trauma.

This study’s data indicates that the queer spectatorship of horror is “a way to work out traumas,” providing spectators “with forms of (sometimes ambivalent or problematic) pleasure” (Sher 2015, 10). Since the language of the unconscious, repression, catharsis, and trauma evoke Freud’s work, I follow Benjamin Raphael Sher, who examines the link between cinephilia and trauma survivors of domestic abuse. Sher summarizes Freud’s theory “that people can use spectatorship and performance of plays as means of working through trauma, [suggesting] that aspects of trauma can be represented, and that people can have profound engagements with representation” (2015, 10). This study’s focus is intentionally set on an active queer spectatorial engagement with the horror genre in order to facilitate processing, surviving, or overcoming the trauma of being queer in a cisheteronormative society. Indeed, queer identity exists in relation to the insidious and compounding trauma of living in a “straight” world. The queer spectator’s connection to horror is not simply grounded in a past historical trauma but, instead, an active and ongoing insidious trauma.<sup>11</sup> Narrator Gabe Castro details ways in which horror representationally offers opportunities to work through queer-embodied trauma:

In horror, we get to live out some of those traumatic experiences and confront them—and whether or not we end up with the protagonists at the end prevailing, we can feel a sense of fear and hope, too. It’s also cathartic to see failure on screen as well. Just seeing someone coping and just dealing with how it is (2020, 8).

Regardless of an individual film’s narrative outcome, then, the horror genre serves as a method for queer spectators to connect with and/or confront—aesthetically, allegorically, and affectively—trauma on the screen, even if they are not consciously aware of these processes.

4.3 The Horror Genre and Traumatic Expression

Queers actively engage with the horror genre by searching for, recognizing in,

---

<sup>11</sup> To be clear, queer trauma is simultaneously historical and ongoing.

and connecting to the generic trauma. The notion of cultural texts serving as a mechanism for healing and transformation has long been considered, as William Veeder suggests of late eighteenth-century gothic fiction that “societies inflict terrible wounds upon themselves and at the same time develop mechanisms that can help heal these wounds” (1998, 21). Extending Veeder’s argument, temporally and textually, my study’s empirical data indicates that, for the queer spectator, the horror genre serves the therapeutic “psychosocial function of nurture, of healing and transforming” (1998, 21). For example, one survey participant shares that they “often seek out movies that have a particular psychological and ‘real’ aspect in how it deals with mental illness and trauma such as depression, abuse from family, because even if these are not meant to be allusions to LGBT themes by the film’s creators they are still aspects that many LGBT people can relate to” (47124820). Given the queer connection to the horror genre and horror’s transgressive queerness, focus on the queer spectator is both warranted and necessary to illuminate a wider understanding of the function of trauma in horror.

Since the horror genre is predicated on engaging with and representing trauma both representationally and allegorically, the queer spectator forges an active therapeutic connection to horror because they recognize in the genre an intrinsic queerness and a reflection of their own queer trauma. I will now demonstrate how this study expands both trauma studies and trauma cinema to resolutely include queer spectatorship’s trauma experience and trauma’s expression through the horror genre. General trauma theory and queer trauma were explicated prior in order to provide a baseline to understand the specific field of trauma cinema, which, as defined by Janet Walker, is “a group of films that deal with a world shattering event or events, whether public or personal” (2005, 19). This definition is further cemented when considering the root of the word trauma, the etymology of which, according to the Oxford English Dictionary, is the Greek word, τραῦμα, for “wound.” As such, the horror genre resolutely fits within the trauma cinema field, replete as it is with shattering traumas, from deaths and dismemberments to stalkings and survivals, and riddled with physical, psychological, and/or psychic wounds. Given trauma’s abject etymological nature, unsurprisingly, trauma manifests in human lives by “haunting” (Luckhurst) and “possessing” (Caruth) people, both of which are resolutely horror genre tropes. In fact, trauma is one of the “recurring themes” that “horror films seem to be built on” (Dumas 2014, 21). This study is not focused on specific instances of representational or allegorical trauma in horror, nor is it concerned with investigating the particular cultural work of horror, as most scholarship heretofore has been. Instead, I am concerned with how queer spectators engage with cultural texts, specifically horror films, to temporarily alleviate their traumas.

As noted, trauma studies has yet to investigate meaningfully the horror genre, while horror academics have primarily deployed trauma studies as a means of reading history and nation. This study, then, queers this branch of horror studies by furthering the discourse framed at the juncture of trauma theory and horror studies built on the works of Lowenstein and Blake. Lowenstein is less concerned with horror as a category and more interested in identifying a film’s “allegorical moment” by asking “does this film access discourses of horror to confront the representation of historical trauma tied to the film’s national and cultural context” (2005, 9). Blake theoretically analyzes national identity discourses that seek to silence sites of national trauma before the nation has healed, ultimately arguing that horror exposes ideology and enables a meaningful form of healing. In these analyses, the horror genre not only “registers most brutally the legacies of historical trauma” (Lowenstein 2005, 10) but also is “generically driven by the abject and the uncanny” (Blake 2008, 3). Further, Blake astutely recognizes “the abject and the uncanny as core signifiers of traumatic historical events” (2008, 3). To this end, queer spectators unsurprisingly find an embodied connection through the irrefutable queerness of the abject and the uncanny, which are socio-cultural expressions shared by both the horror genre and trauma studies. For example, queer spectators explicitly connect their queer trauma(s) to the representational trauma(s) in horror films, with survey participants electing to add comments explaining as much: “Straight people don’t usually have to worry about the deaths, torments, or traumas enacted upon characters in the movie being direct reflections of actual things they face in their daily lives” (47720838); “I feel like LGBTQ+ audiences accept horror more easily because we relate to them more. Whether we feel like outcasts and can relate with specific characters, or we experience trauma that is similar to feelings brought up in the films” (47713806); and “I love movies about trauma survivors grappling with a dangerous world, which to me is the queer experience” (46826850). The circularity between horror, trauma, and queer alterity is precisely why queer spectators find a therapeutic relief through this particular film genre, finding “unique queer interpretations of the trauma that’s often shown in horror” (47123425).

Lowenstein and Blake, through examination of international films, establish horror’s therapeutic effect and argue that horror provides an outlet to collective healing when national trauma is prematurely shut down by ideologies of national identity. Their focus on the collectivity of national identity to examine identity politics is extended by this research, which adds the queer spectator to the list of identified recipients of horror’s therapeutic benefits. I find particularly pertinent Blake’s attestation that “the power of horror may be to effect a certain productive re-engagement with the traumas” (2008, 187). Horror’s therapeutic value to queer spectators exists not because all horror representationally and explicitly exhibits queerness, but because the genre ontologically, subtextually, and allegorically engages with and connects to queer alterity. A survey participant explicitly identifies horror’s specific connection with queer trauma: “Based on the fact that almost all of my most fervent horror fan friends are queer and that the genre resonates with them because of this, I think there is a level of feeling so ‘seen’ by the inherent trauma of horror that we also experience that is missed by heterosexual viewers” (47079311). In other words, this queer connection to horror is not anchored to any specific filmic representation because the horror genre, narratively and allegorically, as with all art forms, is open to individual interpretations (Ballon and Leszcz 2007, 228). Instead, the entire genre itself engenders a cathartic queer connection, as described by a survey participant:

As queer viewers, I believe we identify more intimately with both victim and monster. In our lives we are so frequently victims, we have to be constantly vigilant, and a victim character who overcomes their monsters is intense and empowering. But we’re also characterised as monsters, and we feel their anger and loneliness too. Set against a cast of our oppressors, their slaughtering can be cathartic and gleeful too (47166187).

Indeed, queers feel seen by horror because they recognize a kinship between the trauma shown in horror films and their embodied queer traumas, as both societal victim and monster.

Being seen by horror functions as a form of therapy for queer spectators. Even though horror studies discourse about trauma to date has largely ignored the therapeutic function of horror for the queer spectator, horror's therapeutic capacity was established as far back as 1958 when Dr. Martin Grotjahn of University of Southern California hypothesized that horror films are "self-administered psychiatric therapy for America's adolescents" (Time 1958, 96).<sup>12</sup> As Isabel Pinedo asserts, the horror genre "allow[s] us to exercise, rather than exorcise, emotions of tremendous importance that were otherwise denied legitimate expression" (1997, 2). This study confirms Pinedo and further establishes that horror serves a therapeutic function and role for the full spectrum of queer spectators, thus also extending Adam Scales's view of "the therapeutic function of horror, as it aided young gay horror fans in coming to terms with their identity" (2015, 143). Whereas Scales argues that horror fandom "serves as a form of therapy" (2015, 163) based on analysis of online blogs and discussion threads specifically for spectators who are "self-identifying gay male fans of horror" (2015, 2), this study broadens the scope to include all nonnormative sexualities and genders, and shifts the focus from the therapeutic benefits of horror fandom to the therapeutic connection queer spectators have with the horror film genre. As a survey participant concisely writes, "I think a lot of LGBTQ endure trauma in early life and this perhaps draws them to darker cinematic material" (48757290). One of the reasons horror films help queers process trauma is because horror presents traumas that have narrative closure—an ending to the story—from which the spectator can find satisfaction. Or, at the very least, horror films offer othered queer spectators a different satisfaction, a perspective that their own situation may not be as severe as the traumas being faced on screen. Scales details this occurring in his own queer experience:

In my later teenage years, as the realisation of my gay identity came to the fore, I took solace in watching these movies, of people being threatened and mutilated – knowing that whatever uncertain trajectory my sexual identity would take, nothing would be as bad as what was happening to the vulnerable characters on-screen. Somehow, watching horror seemed to promise a future utopia, giving me hope that everything would be okay (2015, 49).

---

<sup>12</sup> The therapeutic role of film for spectators was evidenced further in Shocking Entertainment: Viewer Response to Violent Movies, in which Annette Hill empirically investigates why people watch violent films. Hill demonstrates (not specifically analyzing or recognizing the queer spectator) that some spectators "chose to see violent movies as a form of 'immediate catharsis,'" an act that culminates with them "view[ing] violent films as a form of therapy" (1997, 23).

Scales sought “solace” in horror films to assuage the trauma of coming into queer subjectivity specifically because the genre is anchored in the performance of trauma. In fact, “cinema performs trauma” (de Bruyn 2014, 15; italics in the original). E. Ann Kaplan details that “forms such as cinema may be especially appropriate to figuring the visual, aural and non-linear fragmented phenomena of trauma” (2001, 204-5). Kaplan is suggesting that the medium of film itself is ontologically conducive to traumatic expression through the techniques of its making, including camerawork, sound design, and editing. As such, the horror genre of film furthers this connection in particular by being centered on traumatic expression representationally, narratively, and creatively. The horror genre functions to “provid[e] a visceral and frequently non-linguistic lexicon in which the experience of cultural dislocation may be phrased,” in which traumatic subjectivity (in Blake’s case, nations; in this one, queers) can recognize, conceptualize, and overcome “traumatic dislocations” (Blake 2008, 189-190). The queer spectator connects with the horror genre by actively forging a therapeutic connection that includes the ontological, phenomenological, representational, and allegorical; this process ultimately culminates with queers “feel[ing] safe in horror films” (46809197). This feeling of safety amidst an unsafe world is considered by trauma cinema theorist Janet Walker, who examines traumatic representations in narrative and documentary films and argues for “the ability of certain films and videos to externalize, publicize, and historicize traumatic material that would otherwise remain at the level of internal, individual psychology” (2005, xix). Walker’s theorization that particular films can convey trauma is pertinent to the queer spectator in explaining how horror externalizes queer trauma, thereby forming a “self-administered” therapeutic conduit for the queer spectator.

4.4 Evidencing Queer Trauma, Affect, and Catharsis

This study has established the queer spectator’s ontological connection to the medium of film and, in particular, the horror genre (see Chapter 1), then explicated how queer subjectivity is marked by insidious trauma, as well as the ways in which critics of horror film have deployed theorizations of trauma in their work. I now turn to presenting empirical evidence and providing analysis of the mixed-method data that establishes the queer spectator's direct, active, and therapeutic engagement with the horror genre to alleviate queer trauma. To date, the preoccupation in horror studies discourse with the representational and allegorical facets of queer horror spectatorship has bypassed the significant affective, cathartic, and ontological queer connections to the genre. In fact, this connection is entirely conscious and direct for many, as this investigation evidences, which stands in contradistinction to Charles Derry's suggestion that "horror films speak to our subconscious and—as do our dreams—deal with issues that are often painful for us to deal with consciously and directly" (1987, 162). This study's mixed-method data evidences that queer spectators have an acute awareness of their queerness and its concomitant trauma and knowingly forge a distinctive relationship to horror. A survey participant, for one, explicitly elucidates the interrelated interconnection between queer identity, trauma, and horror: "My queerness is related to my trauma and I feel that horror movies are a way for me to experience my comfort zone in fear, but in a safer way" (47126140). Moreover, while this study centers the constant insidious trauma to which queers are subjected by the imposition and enforcement of "normal" sexuality, gender, and relationship models by our cisheterosexual society, as narrator Alex Hall perceptively points out, queers also suffer from "the trauma of coming to one's queerness" in the first place (2020, 16). Queers share the experience of coming to terms with their own understanding of their nonnormative sexuality and/or gender, even before confronting the hostile world and the trauma of "social marginalisation or persecution" (Blake 2008, 1). While the horror genre offers numerous therapeutic aspects to cisheteronormative spectators, the therapeutic benefits of horror for the queer spectator are intrinsically connected to their queerness, indicating not simply a correlation but a causation.<sup>13</sup>

---

<sup>13</sup> Horror, as a cultural text, provides positive benefits to people other than the queer spectator. While the aim of this chapter is to analyze the specific relationship between queer trauma and the therapeutic function of horror, it must be noted that non-queer spectators may also find psychological benefits from the cathartic release that horror enables. For example, during the COVID-19 pandemic, a research team conducted an empirical study ( $n = 310$ ) that concludes that horror fans (and the morbidly curious) are exhibiting greater psychological resilience through the pandemic (see Scrivner et al. 2021). However, it should be noted, in order to (re)emphasize how current quantitative methods of measurement and statistical analysis deny

4.4.1 Trauma and the Affective Connection to Horror

Horror films help me work through trauma

FIGURE 4.1. Bar graph that indicates survey participants' level of agreement or disagreement for the following statement: horror films help me work through trauma.

Queer horror fans of all ages recognize the therapeutic benefits of horror, as evidenced by my survey data, which indicates that there is no statistically significant correlation between queer spectators' age and an awareness that horror films help them work through trauma. Likewise, no statistically significant correlation exists between queer spectators' highest level of education completed and an awareness that horror films help them work through trauma. 47.3 percent of queer horror fans strongly agree or agree that horror films help them work through trauma; while that is not a majority consensus, only 18.9 percent strongly disagree or disagree with that statement (see figure 4.1). Therefore, it can be stated with 99 percent confidence that horror films help 45.3 percent to 49.3 percent of all horror-loving queers work through trauma. 31.4 percent of survey participants neither agree or disagree with the statement, and 2.5 percent don't know. With a notable but minority percentage of survey participants selecting the neutral or unknowing opinions, and with 18.9 percent of survey participants strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with the trauma statement, I posit that the data about horror aiding queers in processing trauma falls just short of a majority consensus because the therapeutic engagements with the horror genre might not be immediately understood or known to all queer spectators.<sup>14</sup> This assertion is informed in part by the fact that the vast majority queer subjectivities, the research team explicitly excluded participants "who answered something other than male or female" on their study's demographic question (Scrivner et al. 2021, 2).

---

<sup>14</sup> The noteworthy neutral response to the trauma question accentuates the silence that surrounds queerness and queer trauma, further perpetuating the queer trauma loop. As previously noted, queer trauma in numerous forms, from social isolation to internalized homophobia and from being closeted to receiving microaggressions, may be unacknowledged, of narrators addressed the relationship between horror and trauma. Some spoke of the connection being affective, and others noted that horror films offer escapism from the trauma of being queer.<sup>15</sup> This variation becomes a salient point; horror does, indeed, function therapeutically for queer spectators but each queer person formulates that therapeutic salve to fit their wounds. One example of the fluidity with which horror can confront trauma and offer therapy was provided by narrator Hall:

Horror is very visceral and it's a physical experience—the way that you experience horror is very physical. As I was saying about horror allowing you to be more present in your body, it's a safe medium to process complicated feelings that you wouldn't be able to in your daily reality, but you could confront them through experiencing other people's experiences on screen. Whether or not it's super relatable, in a way, it can still lead to some sort of therapeutic exchange. Just being conscious of how your body is reacting to instances of witnessing trauma on screen, being conscious of your heartbeat and your breathing, and stuff like that. But also just bearing witness to the way queerness is treated on screen can be kind of a way to reclaim a fear of death or to reclaim death—like the legacy of queer characters that have died on screen, the celluloid gravesite of all these characters that didn't make it.<sup>16</sup> Or the desires didn't make it—the desires that just were never told on screen, or had the potential to go there, and then didn't fully come to fruition. I feel a collective mourning through queers experiencing horror in that way (2020, 17-18).

Hall explicitly connects the therapeutic functions of horror to psychophysiological affect,<sup>17</sup> describing how the horror genre creates emotional/mental and physiological responses, such as fear and increased heart rate or sweating, in the queer spectator. Hall reflects that bearing witness to the traumas shown in horror films offers the queer spectator therapeutic reactions. These therapeutic psychophysiological reactions affirm the argument put forth by Xavier Aldana Reyes, in Horror Film and Affect: Towards a unidentified, or unknown to each queer person. I, furthermore, hypothesize a segment of queer individuals to have a lack of awareness of all the ways in which they process their queer trauma.

---

<sup>15</sup> For example, Narrator Harmony Colangelo connects her queerness and love of horror to escaping a transphobic world: "I look at horror as a form of escapism—or at the very least in how it relates to my queerness—there's a power fantasy to some extent. Where certain trans films like Dr. Jekyll and Sister Hyde or Sleepaway Camp—the ever controversial Sleepaway Camp that I am a staunch defender of and Angela's currently on my back with a no TERF [trans-exclusionary radical feminist] sign [both laugh]. So I use horror as a way of escaping the ugly shit of the world and putting it in a more succinct and easy-to-understand way" (2020, 21).

<sup>16</sup> Here, Hall intentionally references Vito Russo's "Necrology," which details film's queer characters who have met premature deaths through suicide, murder, and execution (1987, 347).

<sup>17</sup> A psychophysiological affect is one that causes combined mental and bodily processes to occur in reaction to an event or stimulus, all of which produces an emotion.

Corporeal Model of Viewership, that “horror creates a correlation between the filmic and viewing bodies” (2016, 150). Hall further states that “horror definitely has the ability to process trauma because it is such a visceral, physical genre” (2020, 18). Hall’s words reveal a double meaning and benefit, because the action within a horror film is visceral and physical, and the genre itself provides the spectator with a potential visceral and physical response—in short, a psychophysiological affective experience. Narrator Hall connects the catharsis that comes from a psychophysiological affective experience, found through watching horror films, with the trauma of queer disassociation and invisibility:

Horror is such a visceral, bodily experience. Just feeling very grounded in your body, experiencing fear in that way, is a good check-in to be present, I think. Especially, in the sense of the queer body and in the way that we dissociate a lot or feel invisible a lot, and being able to come back into the body while watching horror—experiencing and processing those feelings also feels . . . it’s a very therapeutic feeling (2020, 4).

Queer spectators like Hall reflect engagement with and rationale for further investigations into affect, as Aldana Reyes recommends, to “help us dig deeper into the human need for fictional and mediated forms of distress, whether strictly corporeal or emotional” (2016, 196-197). The experience had by viewing a horror film is simultaneously mental and physical, narratives from which the queer horror spectator seeks (and finds) a therapeutic relief. Aldana Reyes (along with other scholars such as Clasen) convincingly argues for horror studies discourse to investigate further emotional and physiological responses to the genre, as is empirically accomplished in this study. Horror films offer queer spectators, for one, the opportunity to develop and refine “crucial coping skills” (Clasen 2017, 147) and to increase “psychological resilience” (Scrivner et al. 2021, 2) because the confrontation with fear and trauma in horror films “always happens at a remove” (Aldana Reyes 2016, 51). This study evidences that the therapeutic function of horror gives queer people the ability to confront and better cope with real-life traumas safely from a distance, as unambiguously explained by one survey participant:

I’ve felt hopeless with the world after homophobic experiences and no other movie or show will take away that bitter taste as much as a horror movie . . . in the controlled sense of being scared that you don’t have when faced with real life danger. If anything, horror movies really teach you how to control your fear and how to react more clearheaded to danger (46974221).

Further evidencing this felt reality of queer spectators is the aforementioned empirical study completed during the COVID-19 pandemic, which hypothesizes that “experiencing negative emotions in a safe setting, such as during a horror film, might help individuals hone strategies for dealing with fear and more calmly deal with fear-eliciting situations in real life” (Scrivner et al. 2021, 5).

The psychological and physiological effects achieved by horror films have been established by previous scholars also to occur in fairy tales (see, for example, Twitchell 1985; Turley and Derdeyn 1990; Paul 1994; Wells 2000). Fairy tales allow the reader to “confront their fears through ritualized exposure in a protected environment” (Tamborini and Weaver 1996, 5) while “help[ing] them manage the fears and anxieties they encounter in everyday life” (Ballon and Leszcz 2007, 215). Given the affective psychophysiological benefits of fairy tales, unsurprisingly, a significant number of them have been adapted into horror films. As a whole, the horror genre offers spectators the experience of controlled fear and trauma—quite simply, a sense of control they may not be able to have in their daily existence as a part of a vulnerable population. As a survey participant heedfully comments: “Horror is a genre of vulnerability, both for characters and the audiences” (47708748). A marginalized subjectivity leaves a person vulnerable (in feeling or reality), with a lack of power and the threat of harm; horror can function as one coping mechanism by facilitating the experience of catharsis, a release from strong emotions. Narrator Michael Varrati describes the cathartic release received from watching horror films as such:

Here is a terrible situation that has been encapsulated in 90 minutes, and when those 90 minutes are over, you get a resolution and you get to breathe, you get some release. It may not always end well for the characters, but you know where it ends. Whereas real-life trauma is something you carry with you forever in some way. And so I think that it’s the micro ability to take your real world fears and invest them into something small—into a story, into a movie—and for that period of time, 90 minutes, two hours, whatever, you get to kind of check out of your life and check into somebody else’s issue. And see it play out, and have the chance to just breathe and have release (2020, 5-6).

My study’s mixed-method data offers empirical evidence to the importance of affect in the queer relationship to horror since the horror genre “is a filmic experience premised on the affective and emotional states it prompts in its audience” (Aldana Reyes 2016, 153). As a survey participant writes:

Horror deals with the body - its fluids, its desires, its angles. My relationship to my body has been one filled with denial and dysmorphia and abuse trauma and self-flagellation (former Catholic, former closeted queer), and now that I’m out and watching these films, I can’t help but see my own reality reflected there in helpful and severely true ways (46816302).

In analyzing the relationship between domestic (home-based) trauma survivors and cinephilia, Sher demonstrates that “trauma survivors often find their affective truths, and understand their traumatic experiences, through engagement and identification with sexually violent films, genre films, and low brow films” (2015, 48).<sup>18</sup> This study extends Sher’s findings to include all forms of trauma whilst simultaneously focusing on queer spectators of horror. The queer therapeutic function of horror, a genre often denigrated for its sexual violence and low-brow status, is evidenced by a survey participant who writes: “In a world that hates me for who I am, it’s sometimes therapeutic to watch a film about murder and mayhem, almost like a release” (46895196). Horror films offer queer spectators a therapeutic cathartic release, a psychophysiological affective experience related to traumas directly entwined with queer identity.

4.4.2 Queer Catharsis and the Horror Film

My mix-method data evidences that the vast majority of queer horror spectators find a catharsis through the horror genre.<sup>19</sup> Indeed, 82.4 percent of queer horror fans strongly agree or agree that horror films are cathartic, with only 2.9 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement (see figure 4.2).

Therefore, it can be stated with 99 percent confidence that 80.9 percent to 84 percent of all horror-loving queers find horror films to be cathartic.<sup>20</sup> This

---

<sup>18</sup> Sher further notes that these “sexually violent films, genre films, and low brow films” are precisely “the very types of films that those who believe in a connection between film spectatorship and crime describe as dangerous and deserving of censorship” (2015, 48).

<sup>19</sup> The survey participants provided their opinions about trauma and catharsis in the following two Likert scale statements: “Horror films help me work through trauma” and “Horror films are cathartic.” Even though a connection exists between trauma and catharsis, I designed the survey to collect data on trauma and catharsis separately because trauma is an emotional response and catharsis is an emotional release.

<sup>20</sup> Using the normal approximation of the binomial distribution, the 99 percent confidence interval indicates that the actual percentage in the total horror-loving queer population who would strongly agree or agree that that horror films are cathartic ranges from 80.9 to 84 percent.

provides the emphatic empirical evidence that supports the theories of horror's effective and affective catharsis, contrary to various scholars' doubts. For one, Darryl Jones's "difficulty accepting" the hypothesis that horror films are cathartic is plainly stated: "It seems to me to be a classic example of an intellectual's gambit, a theory offered without recourse to any evidence" (2018, 5). Similarly, Zillmann and Weaver question the overreliance of the "catharsis doctrine," remarking that "this doctrine has failed to attract empirical support of any kind (Geen and Quarty, 1977), but is used nonetheless to suggest that the consumption of horror is beneficial by relieving deep-rooted anxieties, and that the experience of relief makes for the genre's attractiveness" (1996, 88). Numerous scholars have theorized the cathartic benefits of the horror genre and, as shown, various scholars have questioned those theoretical assertions. However, this study's mixed-method data empirically evidences a cathartic experience and indicates that the specifically queer trauma experienced by queers produces a critical relationship for queer spectators between horror films and their cathartic function.

The reasons "horror films can feel cathartic" (47116502) are myriad. For some queer spectators, "it's cathartic to watch and experience fictional larger than life traumas being played out that I can relate my own to" (47079421); for others "seeing queer people be monsters/evil can be oddly cathartic" (46896188). The queer spectator's therapeutically cathartic relationship to the horror genre is a connection that is directly linked to their queer embodiment. In other words, queers connect the trauma(s) of their queer experience, existing within the cisheteronormative world, to the trauma(s) on the screen in horror films. Numerous survey participants elucidate this relationship between queer trauma and the therapeutic catharsis that horror provides: "I think it can be scary growing up queer so there's a deeper catharsis when you watch horror movies and you see characters going through the horror and hopefully making it to the end of the film" (46979755); "I think as an LGTB viewer I view horror more for catharsis and empathetic release than heterosexual viewers whose lives often don't allow for empathy with the high stress hypervigilance of horror films" (47757805); "Having felt like an outsider and unsafe at times, I think I get a huge catharsis from getting to purge those feelings regularly" (47082203). These survey participant responses, alongside numerous others, not only explicitly connect queer spectatorship of horror films to queerness and queer trauma, but also clearly evidence the catharsis experienced from viewing horror films.

Horror films are cathartic

FIGURE 4.2. Bar graph that indicates survey participants' level of agreement or disagreement for the following statement: horror films are cathartic.

4.4.3 Trauma and the Queer Lens

This study's survey data demonstrates that survey participants for whom horror films help work through trauma also exhibit an increased awareness that their queerness affects their relationship to horror. An independent-samples t-test was conducted to compare survey participants' responses to the question about the therapeutic function of the horror genre; the t-test compared the statistical means between participants who report that they have a different reaction to horror films (as compared with heterosexual viewers) and those who do not. A statistically significant difference exists in the therapeutic function of horror for participants who report that they have a different reaction to horror films versus those who do not ( $p < .000$ ). The results indicate that survey participants who report more strongly receiving therapeutic benefits from horror are more likely to be those who report that they have a different reaction to horror films as compared with heterosexual viewers.<sup>21</sup> Additionally, a statistically significant difference exists for horror films helping spectators work through trauma between participants who feel that being queer influences their taste in horror films and those who do not ( $p < .000$ ). The results indicate that survey participants who more strongly receive therapeutic benefits from horror are more likely to be those who report that being queer influences their taste in horror films.<sup>22</sup> Having examined the therapeutic effects of horror for the queer spectator, I conclude that those survey participants who are cognizant that their queerness affects their reactions to and preferences in horror are also those more likely to be attuned to understanding their trauma as specifically caused by being queer in a hostile society, since living outside of normative structures can be a perilous state.

<sup>21</sup> A statistically significant difference exists in the mathematical means between survey participants who report they have a different reaction to horror films than heterosexual viewers ( $M = 2.33$ ,  $SD = 1.094$ ) and those who do not ( $M = 2.78$ ,  $SD = 1.091$ ) compared with responses to the statement "Horror films help me work through trauma";  $t(3963) = -12.8$ ,  $p < .000$ ,  $d = .41$ .

4.4.4 The Queer Trauma Connection to Slashers and Body Horror

Two horror subgenres positively correlated in my study's data with the therapeutic effects of horror further evidence that the queer spectator's relationship to horror is explicitly connected to trauma. Spearman's rho correlation calculations, comparing those for whom horror films help work through trauma with preferences for each horror subgenre, yielded numerous highly statistically significant positive correlations, revealing the two subgenres with the highest effect sizes as body horror ( $r_s = .20, p < .000$ ) and slasher ( $r_s = .19, p < .000$ ).<sup>23</sup> As evidenced in Chapter 3, slashers are in the top ten of most loved and/or liked subgenres for queer spectators. While slasher films are discussed in copious academic discourse, far too little centers the significance of trauma, with the traumatic dimensions of the slasher film having been particularly neglected by critics given that slasher movies are ultimately about trauma.<sup>24</sup> The slasher film is predicated on the "survival suspense" of the final girl, to whom queer spectators significantly connect and with whom they identify, as established and evidenced in Chapter 3. Significantly, that filmic "survival suspense is largely emotional and premised on the well-being of the character(s)" (Aldana Reyes 2016, 119). For queer spectators, the final girl represents the ultimate model of triumphant survival against an overwhelming and threatening reality, as noted by a survey participant: "Watching final girls

---

<sup>22</sup> A statistically significant difference exists in the mathematical means between survey participants who report that being queer influences their taste in horror films ( $M = 2.35, SD = 1.076$ ) and those who do not ( $M = 2.76, SD = 1.119$ ) compared with responses to the statement "Horror films help me work through trauma";  $t(3958) = -11.7, p < .000, d = .37$ .

<sup>23</sup> The other two of the top four are Rape Revenge ( $r_s = .18, p < .000$ ) and Extreme Horror ( $r_s = .18, p < .000$ ), rounding out the top four subgenres with highly statistically significant positive correlations and the largest effect sizes for queer spectators who report horror helps them work through trauma.

<sup>24</sup> Sher bolsters this claim by remarking that "Scream draws attention to the fact that many horror movies, especially slasher movies, are about domestic trauma" (2015, 113).

triumph over killers and emerge victorious, or become monstrous themselves is so satisfying and affirming” (47079311). Queer trauma finds a cathartic release through the final girl’s survival, creating a kinship and fondness for the final girl as representation for overcoming trauma, as explicitly commented by survey participants: “I tend to relate to a final girl due to overcoming personal trauma in my own life” (46936127); the “final girl trope is so important to me. I’ve always identified with her, with how she overcomes her fear and trauma and becomes stronger” (47082733). While Carol Clover argues for male spectators’ catharsis through identification with the final girl, this study’s data demonstrates that the final girl is a distinctively queer model of trauma survival.

Queers relate to the final girl and experience catharsis from the survival suspense of the final girl trope, whereas queer spectators’ affinity for the body horror subgenre is centered on body betrayal. Body horror displays nonnormative transgressions that render the body into “an object over which the subject has no control” (Humphries 2002, 169). Although the subgenre of body horror does not have a commonly accepted or clearly delineated definition, films categorized as such portray experiences of corporeal representations and transformations that are aberrant and/or grotesque.<sup>25</sup> The queer spectator, most specifically transgender members of the community,<sup>26</sup> find a therapeutic cathartic release from body horror films because they “radically figured, disfigured, and refigured the human body, focusing on it relentlessly as a site of pain, and anxiety and disgust, but also of transformation and transcendence” (Jones 2018, 94). Indeed, trans* survey participants express and explain a particular connection to the representations of transformed and transcended bodily norms as presented in body horror films, writing: “Body horror grosses out many but is cathartic for me as a trans person, seeing others transcend the limits of their body via effects” (47078232); “I’m trans, so I also think I have a different perspective on body horror than a cisgender person might, and often find themes of transformation in horror to be exciting and cathartic” (47082799).

---

<sup>25</sup> In 2020, horror theorist Xavier Aldana Reyes put forth the following definition of body horror: “The term ‘body horror’ is used to describe a type of fiction or cinema where corporeality constitutes the main site of fear, anxiety and sometimes even disgust for the characters and, by extension, the intended readers/viewers” (393).

<sup>26</sup> The breakdown for cisgender and transgender survey participants (women and men combined) who “love” and “like” the body horror subgenre is as follows: 74.5 percent of transgender ( $n = 379$ ) horror spectators love or like body horror compared with 64.2 percent of cisgender ( $n = 1,627$ ).

Body horror offers trans* community members ways to relate to and have an outlet for their “dysmorphia” (47082888) and “feelings of dysphoria” (47086892).<sup>27</sup> A non-binary participant connects to horror because of “the feeling that your body and the feelings you feel are still seen as abnormal, or monstrous, by many people who are not LGBTQ+” (47069306). This brief empirical investigation into the slasher and body horror subgenres demonstrates that the queer connection to horror is inseparable from queer embodiment, trauma, and, as will be explored, camp.

4.5 Traumatic Expressions from Catharsis to Camp

I have thus far examined the therapeutic effect of the horror genre for the queer spectator, relating queer identity with the trauma of living in the “traumatizing processes and structures” of cisheteronormative society (Davis and Meretoja 2020, 4). As discussed, queer trauma can take as many forms as there are individual queer subjectivities. For example, one survey participant shares that “when the monster is a metaphor for abuse or grief I relate heavily to them because although I am transmasculine I was treated as a woman by the ‘monsters’ in my own life” (47080740). Narrator Christopher Velasco recalls: “Watching A Nightmare on Elm Street 2: Freddy’s Revenge, really helped me deal with the trauma of being different. Though it wasn’t a direct correlation to my life, I just knew this movie was about me” (2020, 16). The differences in how queer spectators understand and express their trauma matters less than the collective shared experience of cisheteronormativity traumatizing queers. My study builds upon and adds to earlier critical approaches of cinema therapy by specifically centering the horror genre’s therapeutic potentials for the queer spectator.

Queer people have few communal gathering spaces, outside of the dwindling numbers of bars and clubs, but movie theatres have become one, as will be discussed in Chapter 5. The importance of movie theatres is argued by

---

<sup>27</sup> The Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Fifth Edition (DSM-5), categorizes gender dysphoria as a mental health diagnosis in which individuals “have a marked incongruence between the gender they have been assigned to (usually at birth, referred to as natal gender) and their experienced/expressed gender” (2013, 453). Body dysmorphic disorder is a term to describe when a person “focuses on the alteration or removal of a specific body part because it is perceived as abnormally formed not because it represents a repudiated assigned gender” (2013, 458).

John Izod and Joanna Dovalis, in Cinema as Therapy: Grief and Transformational Film, who state that “the movie theatre shares symbolic features with both the church and the therapy room: all are sacred spaces where people can encounter the archetypal and ease personal suffering, in the case of the cinema whether through laughter or tears, without inhibition or fear” (2015, 1). For the queer spectator, movie theatres can function as safe, sacred spaces to watch films and ease their trauma; in particular, the queer spectator often experiences the genre through the combination of fear with laughter when watching a horror film in a darkened theatre. Often queer people experience this juxtaposition through camp, as will be explained in the subsequent section, because “camp embraces and even flaunts a stigmatized identity in order to ‘neutralize the sting and make it laughable’” (Pellegrini quoting Esther Newton 2015, 179). Camp stems from queer trauma and survival, as a “combination of dark humor, traumatic pain, and ‘resistance to vulnerability’” (Brickman 2017, 28). Camp is known to be a queer sensibility, but its power for queers lies under the surface in its relationship with trauma; to this, theorist “[Ann] Cvetkovich recognizes the use of camp around trauma in queer culture” (Brickman 2017, 28). Queers often filter traumatic pain through humor and laughter as a survival tactic. I will argue, furthermore, that camp functions as a vulnerable resistance. By this I mean, camp’s utility to resist and challenge cisheteronormativity is informed by queer vulnerability and trauma, evidenced through my study’s qualitative responses, including this survey participant’s direct connection of trauma and camp:

I’m drawn to horror films that are stylized in such a way that focuses on either character or place in such a way that reflects what some may term ‘camp,’ or otherwise performative or affected sensibilities. The actual horror that I experience within such films is often a challenge to [the] ability of norms of family, love, or social relations to ‘save’ us from the legacy of trauma (47573274).

A camp sensibility or aesthetic, such as exaggeration, can be deployed to communicate (and thus process) trauma, as noted by Nadin Mai in remarking on trauma theorist Janet Walker’s “‘quality of exaggeration’ in style for an evocation of ‘trauma’ which is employed in an attempt to adequately transmit the quality of the traumatic events” (2015, 61). Through the analysis and presentation of mixed-method data, this research has evidenced that horror offers queers a cathartic relief from their specific queer trauma. This study demonstrates that queer spectators not only find a cathartic release for their queer traumas in horror, but also realize a further dimension of trauma processing through the joyous, affective elements of camp. Camp, therefore, as a powerful expression of queer trauma, can be seen as a further, joyous, means of processing queer trauma in horror cinema. To understand the dynamic between the queer spectator, horror film, and camp, the difficult-to-define and intangible sensibility that is camp must be examined first.

4.6 Defining Camp as a Relationship

While Andrew Ross states that “universal definitions of camp are rarely useful” (2014, 146), I grasp here a definition that provides an understanding of camp’s role as a relationship queers have with horror through its function as a sensibility, as “a system of meaning and a method of perception” (Taylor 2012, 69). Camp is a noun, an adjective, and a verb. Camp is irreducible (Cleto 1999, 29) and undefinable (Ludlam 1992, 227), transgressive (Brickman 2016, 383) and subversive (Babuscio 1977, 42). Camp is a queer concept, lens, mode, code, sensibility, aesthetic, style, tool, critique, performance, essence, feeling, strategy, function, practice, product, reception, effect, taste, and language.<sup>28</sup> Unlike Susan Sontag who, in her influential essay “Notes on ‘Camp,’” marks camp as “wholly aesthetic” (1964, 49), this research defines camp as a queer sensibility that goes beyond the artistic surface. While defining camp may be a “self-defeating” project (Core 1984, 5), that effort is worthwhile because camp functions as an essential relational tool of queer nonnormativity. As Michael Bronski writes, “camp changes the real, hostile world into a new one which is controllable and safe” (1984, 42). Stated differently, queers use camp reimaginings to relate to other people and cultures (and cultural products), creating feelings of safety and connection. This study builds on the work of Cynthia Barounis, who “is less interested in what camp looks like than in what camp feels like” (2018, 217). Since queer people feel they have “a special appreciation for camp” (47150431), it feels to them as a way of relating to normative society. As example, narrator Joshua Grannell has “adopted and accepted this idea of camp that is queerness. . . . I think you can take the word camp and really define it as an insider’s queer perspective on what is wonderful and outrageous” (2020d, 11). Camp is active, involving the agency of the reader in a mode of cultural engagement and “has the power to transform experience” (Sontag 1964, 43).

---

<sup>28</sup> Camp means many different things to many different queer people, as illustrated by narrator Alex Hall when she declares camp to be a lifestyle: “I love camp. For me personally, it goes beyond aesthetics. It feels like a language and then also a lifestyle, but just encompassing more. There’s queer joyfulness to camp that allows for pleasure to be experienced in a way that films that adhere to certain sensibilities probably wouldn’t” (2020, 21).

Camp has previously been called apolitical (Sontag 1964), the domain of the gay male (Dyer 2002), and “a distanced and distancing reception practice” (Benshoff 150, 2008). However, my study’s mixed-method data demonstrates that camp is, in fact, entirely political, inclusively queer, deeply intimate, and fully embodied. Stated differently, because queer people use camp to relate to normative society, camp is an intimate and embodied politic. As Jack Babuscio, one of camp’s early theorists, writes: “Camp is never a thing or person per se, but, rather, a relationship” (1977, 40-41; italics in the original). While Babuscio remained focused on the gay camp relationship to “activities, individuals, situations” (1977, 41), a relationship is still the most appropriate way to describe the queer connection to camp because relationships exist in many forms, none looking exactly the same.<sup>29</sup> One commonality to these distinct relationships, however, is the existence of genuine love, as Christopher Isherwood indicates: “You can’t camp about something you don’t take seriously. You’re not making fun of it; you’re making fun out of it. You’re expressing what’s basically serious to you in terms of fun and artifice and elegance” (1999, 51). If camp is a queer way of relating to the world, it serves to examine this common camp relationship that queer people share. In this case, queer spectators’ love of horror film is grounded in a serious connection to the genre facilitated by a camp relationship (McElroy 2014, 293). In other words, queer spectators have a “camp relationship” to horror.

4.7 The Camp Relationship to Horror

Camp is, most significantly to this study, a relationship between a queer spectator and the horror film. In fact, 80.4 percent of the survey participants report enjoying the confluence of camp and horror. Camp is an important relationship to horror in queer spectatorship because queers “camp” what they see in this film genre, recognizing in horror facets also fundamental to camp: over-the-top excess, flamboyant extravagance, exaggerated abjection, artifice, extremity, and trauma. The queer spectator of horror directly connects horror aestheticism to camp, which is a politicized queer expression. This camp relationship to horror for queer spectators runs counter to hegemonic attitudes about the horror genre being conservative, regressive, misogynistic, racist, and/or homophobic.<sup>30</sup> While Susan Sontag said that to talk about camp is to betray it (1964, 42), queers find a power through defining our meaning of camp based on our lived, and often silenced, queer experience. Queers are drawn to and connect with horror to process and alleviate the pain of societal marginalization and demonization in part because the horror genre is imbued with key camp attributes, such as “the spirit of extravagance” (Sontag 1964, 47) and the “love of the unnatural: of artifice and exaggeration” (Sontag 1964, 42). This connection is particularly powerful since, as explicated, both horror and camp are potent expressions of queer trauma. Olivia Oliver-Hopkins notes that “despite considerable crossover, relatively little theoretical work has been completed on the relationship between the horror genre and notions of camp” (2017, 151). This study, therefore, expands the current discourse on the intersections of camp and horror and does so through an explicitly queer lens.

---

<sup>29</sup> Lauren Levitt underscores camp’s subjectivity, writing: “There is much disagreement as to the nature of camp. One of the few things that most scholars agree on is that camp is subjective” (2017, 172).

Since queer horror spectators explicitly connect camp and horror each to their queerness, having a camp relationship to horror is a decidedly queer manifestation. As evidenced by this study’s mixed-method data, queer spectators actively engage with camp and report that camp serves as a relationship to horror. My data demonstrates, in fact, that the camp connection to horror feels decidedly queer and entirely essential to queer horror spectators. As several survey participants state: “There is a strong camp element to horror that queers seem to naturally understand” (47616489); and “queer people have an innate understanding of the camp undertones that horror is based on” (47706009). This study positions camp as a relationship queers have with a cultural production, the horror genre, as a personal and political relationship for processing individual trauma and community bonding through laughter.

---

<sup>30</sup> Examples of these narratives are found in discussions that position horror as “a conservative genre that works to justify and defend the status quo” (Jancovich 2002, 13). As Oliver-Hopkins affirms, “the conservative or even regressive political implications of many horror films (Crank 2011, 212; Herbert-Leiter 2011, 195; Murphy 2013, 173)” has been often argued by scholars (2017, 151).

The queer spectator's embodied connection to horror is genuine, in part due to the camp relationship; it is not a distanced and ironic reaction to hegemonic cultural production (see, for example, Sontag 1964; Babuscio 1977; Benschhoff 2008; Schmidt 2014; Brickman 2016; Levitt 2017). The queer spectator's camp relationship to horror uses camp as a political tool of disidentificatory practice.<sup>31</sup> Disidentification is a political act of survival in which minorities (re)negotiate dominant culture and its products through transformation to fit their own purposes and needs. This concept advanced by queer theorist José Esteban Muñoz examines queer BIPOC disidentificatory practices. As Muñoz states:

Disidentification is about recycling and rethinking encoded meaning. The process of disidentification scrambles and reconstructs the encoded message of a cultural text in a fashion that both exposes the encoded message's universalizing and exclusionary machinations and recircuits its workings to account for, include, and empower minority identities and identifications (1999, 31).

While written to explain BIPOC queer practices, the concept of disidentification can be applied to understand the political nature of queer horror spectatorship both because a significant percentage of the survey participants are BIPOC and all the participants are queer, thereby embodying a shared intersectionality that subsists outside dominant culture. Muñoz's concept of disidentification highlights, therefore, how queer horror spectatorship operates both "within and outside" dominant horror spectatorship (1999, 5). Queer horror fans enjoy many of the same films as cisheteronormative horror spectators; however, queer spectators employ camp, a distinctively queer manner and method of relating to the world, as a relationship with horror, a genre always already connected to their queer embodiment.

While the definition of camp has eluded consensus and concrete

---

<sup>31</sup> "It goes without saying that camp has a crucial resonance in queer discursive histories and cultural practices," Daphne Brooks affirms, and "may, in fact, be the fulcrum of queer identity politics" (2006, 274). While outside the scope of this study, I recognize Black and class-based straight camp scholarship, indicating a relationship to camp for "parallel marginalities based on race and class" (Brooks 2006, 274). Arguing for the visibility of Black camp, Brooks states: "Queer camp and the camp of cakewalking are not a conflated form of identity production; rather each works in the service of dismantling a dominant ontological paradigm" (2006, 274).

determination, camp has been continually connected to queer identity. Indeed, for many queers, camp is the key performative and interpretative aspect of queer identity. Muñoz argues that “to perform queerness is to constantly disidentify, to constantly find oneself thriving on sites where meaning does not properly ‘line up’” (1999, 78). The camp relationship to horror lines up the intrinsic queerness of the genre with the embodied queerness of the spectator. Through their camp relationship with horror, queer horror spectators “resist the oppressive and normalizing discourse of dominant ideology” (Muñoz 1999, 97), identifying with the queerness of the horror genre, engendering queer empowerment, and fostering queer community. Queer spectators’ camp relationship to horror neither functions to assimilate nor resist mainstream horror; instead, it represents how queer horror spectators form a sui generis horror fandom of disidentification, representing the “crucial practice of contesting social subordination through the project of worldmaking” (Muñoz 1999, 200). Queer horror spectators, individually and collectively, construct queer space, a campy horrific world in which their community flourishes.

4.8 Queering the Camp-Horror Nexus

Building on the existing scholarship that establishes the camp-horror nexus, my mixed-method data evidences the importance of queerness to this concept. This study specifically explicates how queer spectators relate to the nexus of camp and horror. Jason Lagapa defines the “camp-horror nexus” as a fusion of “campy stylistics and [g]othic motifs into a single aesthetic, one that invokes B-movie horror to achieve humorous, mannered and uncanny effects” (2010, 93). Oliver-Hopkins, advancing Jason Lagapa’s camp-horror concept from the aesthetic to the political, argues through a class-based analysis that “the self-love present in the camp-horror nexus enables these minority cultures to feel pride and joy in place of fear of judgment or shame” (2017, 158). In their formulation of this concept, both Oliver-Hopkins and Lagapa bypass specifically discussing the queer spectator’s active role in the existence of the camp-horror nexus. Indeed, this study argues that the intersection of horror and camp is forged through the queer spectator, in the prideful and joyous manner Oliver-Hopkins outlines and as part of a relationship—a relationship to horror that is constantly and actively mediated by queerness embodied by living queer spectators. The diverse spectrum of queer spectators directly informs the fluidity and dynamism of camp-horror expressions. In other words, there are as many expressions of the camp-horror nexus as there are queer embodiments because it is a relationship informed by each individual's sensibility.

The queer connection to horror is forged in both how queer people read horror (finding unintentional camp in the genre) and how they appreciate the explicit camp attributes of horror. Specifically, I argue that the queered camp-horror nexus can be defined by three primary queer relationship instigators and shared attributes between camp and horror: camp and horror's shared aesthetics and themes, transgressive natures, and coded queerness. Horror and camp share core attributes that resonate with queer spectators. When discussing film genres, including horror, that hold particular appeal to queer audiences, Benshoff and Griffin allude to reasons connected to camp attributes, such as heightened aesthetics, writing that "other genres [are] popular with queer audiences precisely because of their elaborate, fantastic styles. Musicals, horror films, and cartoons all flaunt their lack of realism and their disdain for the 'normal'" (2006, 71). This study's mixed-method data not only substantiates Benshoff and Griffin's claim, but also further refines the queer spectatorial connections with the camp-horror nexus. Specifically, the horror genre shares attributes with camp through its aesthetics and themes: over-the-top excess (e.g., gore and violence), emotional theatricality (e.g., expressions of fear and survival such as screaming, yelling, and crying) and personified extravagance (e.g., delicious villains and hordes of monsters). For example, survey participants affirm the queer "love of excess, extremes, hyperbole" (47165704) and that queers "have a soft spot for camp and extravagance in horror" (46975767). These attributes pertain to not only horror films that are deliberately campy, but also—and more significantly—the horror genre's aesthetics. These horror genre aesthetics (whether found overall in the genre or specifically in campy horror films) include "exaggerated depictions of the grotesque, preposterous death and dismemberments, detached humor, and conscious deployment of generic tropes" (Kelly 2016, 93). Survey participants repeatedly demonstrate an appreciation both that "camp can reflect the heightened reality of horror" (47034234) and that they have a connection with horror characters: "I can read myself into characters that straight people can't or won't, I can map my experiences onto horror more easily" (47100974).<sup>32</sup>

Whether the camp queers experience in horror is deliberate in a film's production or through an individual's own queer reception of a film, camp enhances the queer connection to the genre, since queer horror fans take "a pleasure in campness and a sort of willful excess" (47108216) and "tend to have a good understanding of the genre's tropes and tendency toward excess, which they celebrate" (47081807). Camp, in fact, opens the queer spectator to the horror genre, as one survey participant affirms: "My camp aesthetic taste allows me to be more open to the breadth of the genre" (46854175).

Through his examination of horror, Gregory Waller further shows how "horror has proven to be a genre that accommodates and encourages a heightened sense of stylization in editing, camera movement, and mise-en-scène" (1987, 149). These "excessive aesthetics of horror" (Cherry 2009, 80) are a key connection point for queer spectators, with some queer horror fans discussing horror aesthetics in a manner that underscores the camp presence in the genre: "Horror is deliciously aesthetic; it layers meaning onto image and moment in a way that seems to align with and highlight queer sensibility" (47182398). Another survey participant notes their reaction and relation to "camp and over the top grotesque" (47238133) in horror. And another survey participant explains: "The horror films I love tend to have characters and aesthetics that, in a somewhat hard to articulate way, I associate with queerness. It's not necessarily because they involve queer characters—they usually don't" (46826850). These quotes illustrate the awareness survey participants have of their specifically queer connection to horror being rooted in camp, directly linking to the camp aesthetic featured in horror: "I think that queer people have a unique appreciation for the theatricality and aesthetic spectacle of horror films" (46826850) and queers "'get' camp a bit more and can appreciate the over the top nature of horror differently" (47109055). For horror-loving queers, the unique lens that allows them to find camp in horror is also that which facilitates repudiating normality and transgressing the cisheteropatriarchy's norms.

The sexual and gender transgressions of nonnormative queer existence directly relate to the transgressiveness of both horror and camp. Harry Benshoff argues that “camp was even used to destabilize and question the nature of cinema and reality itself” (2008, 170), alluding to a cinematic and ontological transgression facilitated by camp. Specifically, queerness, horror, and camp all share a transgression of the normative, as transgression depends on the enforcement of norms to transgress. The horror genre continuously responds to individual as well as societal fears and taboos whilst pushing the bounds of explicitness. Cynthia Hendershot states that “the horror film is a genre that operates within a framework of taboo and transgression” (2001, 25). Since queerness itself is seen to transgress normative existence (which is centered around heterosexual, monogamous pairings for the primary purpose of reproduction), queer horror fans relate to the function of horror to transgress the safety and predictability of that normative society. In fact, the queer relationship to both horror and camp is partially formed through the embodied connection to transgression. Barbara Jane Brickman asserts that queers may find “transgressive pleasures in camp readings” (2016, 383), which this study’s data supports. In fact, queers take active agency in transforming horror through their camp relationship, forging an explicitly queer connection (as opposed to the implicit queer connection to horror—a genre that queers understand to be intrinsically queer). A survey participant encapsulates this queer connection to horror and camp: “Queer folks seem to have an enhanced unconscious awareness of the uncanny, camp, and acts of transgressions” (47181591). The societal transgression embodied by queer people finds expression in the camp-horror nexus. Indeed, queer horror fans “love anything campy and subversive . . . that codes as queer” (47026811).

---

<sup>32</sup> For example, as Adam Scales points out, "Freddy serves as a gay/camp icon" (2015, 121).

Queer spectators also explicitly, or knowingly, connect the coded queerness within the horror genre with camp. As established in Chapter 1, the horror genre has coded the monster as queer, an othered character and representation of the queer experience in cisheteronormative society. The monster is often queer-coded in horror and “queer desire is also coded as horror” (46914100). Queer-coded (and even overtly queer) characters and performances, particularly but not exclusively campy ones, have helped to define and differentiate the horror genre, from Dr. Pretorius (The Bride of Frankenstein) to Dr. Frank-N-Furter (The Rocky Horror Picture Show), and from Renfield (Dracula) to Freddy Krueger (A Nightmare on Elm Street franchise).

Camp, independent from and certainly within horror, historically has functioned as queer code. As Dolores McElroy argues, this is because camp was “a way to be identified as gay by other gays, yet dodge explicit identification by straights (heterosexuals), who were often unable to read the ambiguities of the code. In other words, camp provided both advertisement and cover” (2016, 295). Historically, queerness needed to be coded in relationship with cultural production or cultural reception for queer people’s safety and, indeed, survival, a relationship that is both a means of connection between queer people and a mode of queer survival within the normative mainstream. This manifests in queer subtextual/implicit production and reception within the camp-horror nexus. To this, a survey participant knowingly and rhetorically asks: “Isn’t everything in horror queer coded anyway? I think that’s a lot of what draws me to it” (47114181). Since “camp has evolved from a primarily private code of secret communication” (Horn 2017, 16) to a shared and political relationship as part of the queer community’s engagement with cisheteronormative society and its cultural production, camp often remains coded and subtextual (but no less potent).<sup>33</sup> In fact, queer horror fans are acutely aware that camp is an integral aspect of their relationship to horror, as a survey participant details: “I think we’re more likely to decode the subtext of a film and appreciate what is under the surface (ex. Elm St 2) or appreciate campier things for what they are (ex. also Elm St 2)” (47196839).<sup>34</sup> As another survey participant states: “There is a lot of coded queer semiotics in horror movies that make some moments, images, and themes maybe more resonant for queer audiences” (47182398). Queer spectators recognize and read queer coding in horror film, a queer act that historically has been fulfilled also through camp, which was used covertly to see and be seen within the queer community. The queer use of camp in relation to society and cultural productions such as horror films supports numerous survey participants’ conviction that “cis-hets aren’t as accepting of camp in horror movies” (47082931). The attributes shared between the horror genre and camp, including aesthetics, transgression, and queer coding, both bolster the <sup>33</sup> A survey participant underscores the distinctly queer connection in horror to the transgression, aesthetics, and subtext in camp: “We understand horror films as essential aesthetic modalities for our darker fears and behaviors. This goes hand in hand with the powerful queer cultivation of queer aesthetics, in which to encode, operate, and celebrate our reviled existence” (47114181).

---

<sup>34</sup> Queer horror fans also report a love for “campier characters in films, like Freddy, Pinhead, or Hannibal Lecter” (47112178).

camp relationship between queers and the horror genre and cement the queer camp-horror nexus in the critical fields of camp, horror, and queer studies.

4.9 Evidentiary Data on Queerness, Camp, and Horror

I enjoy “camp-y” horror films

FIGURE 4.3. Bar graph that indicates survey participants' level of agreement or disagreement for the following statement: I enjoy “camp-y” horror films.

This study demonstrates with data that the vast majority of queer horror fans connect camp with their enjoyment of horror films.<sup>35</sup> Specifically, the mixed-method data evidences that queer spectators have a camp relationship with horror and recognize the queer camp-horror nexus.<sup>36</sup> This study's data stands in sharp contrast to Alexander Dhoest and Nele Simons's findings that “the gay sensibility and camp as reading strategies” have “largely disappeared” due to increased mainstream visibility and assimilation (2012, 274). The data, in fact, serves to establish camp as a critical facet in queer spectators' relationship with horror film. As noted by Brigid Cherry, empirical audience research can evidence the “variation in the way different groups interpret or respond to different kinds of cinematic horror” (2009, 155). My mix-method data, both the survey's single explicit question about camp in horror and the hundreds of comments survey participants elected to write, reveals the importance of camp in queer spectators' relationships to horror.<sup>37</sup> My data emphatically demonstrates, in fact, that the overwhelming majority of survey participants, and thus horror-loving queers in the world according to statistical extrapolation, report a camp relationship to horror regardless of sexual orientation, gender, age, or nationality.<sup>38</sup> As noted prior, it can be stated with 99 percent confidence that 78.7 percent to 81.9 percent of all horror-loving queers enjoy “camp-y” horror films (see figure 4.3).<sup>39</sup> As a survey participant observes: “As a queer person, I think I enjoy camp so much more than a cishet person. And enjoying and understanding camp usually means that I’ll like more horror movies than other viewers” (48126762). My data further affirms Elly-Jean Nielsen’s call for “a radical reconceptualization of camp as a queer counter-praxis, one that is inclusive” of all queer people (2016, 123).

<sup>35</sup> Queer horror fans connect with both deliberately camp horror films and horror films decoded as camp by the queer gaze.

<sup>36</sup> The relevance and abundance of the queer camp relationship to horror became known as a result of the survey and its corresponding statistical conclusions. My arguments about the queer camp-horror nexus have been bolstered by the qualitative data gathered in the written survey responses and the oral history interviews. Future studies should empirically examine the queer camp relationship to horror in greater detail.

<sup>37</sup> Hundreds of survey participants electively wrote comments that evidence they have a camp relationship to horror in response to questions about how their reactions to and taste in horror are altered by their queerness.

This study employs qualitative and quantitative data from a survey of queer horror spectators to situate “camp within a queer rather than exclusively gay male discourse” (Taylor 2012, 67). In all, the survey data dispels the notion that camp is the provenance of the gay cisgender man, instead affirming camp is a decidedly queer relationship created through the wholly queer experience. Even though, as Andrew Ross states, camp “works to destabilize, reshape, and transform the existing balance of accepted sexual roles and sexual identities” (2008, 62), numerous scholars theorize camp primarily in relation to cis gay men (see Sontag 1964; Ross 1988; Dyer 1999; and Humphrey 2014). Richard Dyer goes as far as to argue that camp is just about the only style, language and culture that is distinctively and unambiguously gay male. One of our greatest problems is that we are cut adrift for most of the time in a world drenched in straightness. All the images and words of the society

---

<sup>38</sup> My survey data demonstrates notable differences in camp reception due to national differences, which further supports the need for future research beyond an American-centric study. “The relationship of queer American culture and its love of ‘camp aesthetics’ to the horror genre,” Daniel Humphrey observes, “has not been fully explored” (2014, 42). While the majority of all queer horror fans enjoy camp in horror, 82.5 percent of participants from the US, 78.3 percent from the UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand, and 65.6 percent from elsewhere in the world enjoy camp in horror. 6.7 percent of the participants from places other than the US, the UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand have the highest rate of not knowing whether or not they enjoy campy horror films (compare with 1.2 percent of US participants and 1.1 percent of UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand participants). This data further encourages empirical examination into international queer culture and its relationship with camp. Regardless of any differences, the data demonstrates an undeniable international queer connection to camp and horror.

<sup>39</sup> Using the normal approximation of the binomial distribution, the 99 percent confidence interval indicates that the actual percentage in the total horror-loving queer population who would strongly agree or agree that they enjoy “camp-y” horror films ranges from 78.7 to 81.9 percent.

express and confirm the rightness of heterosexuality. Camp is one thing that expresses and confirms being a gay man (2002, 49).

Camp theory's focus on gay cisgender men is somewhat unsurprising given the historical bias to white cisgender gay men in queer theory, which has, along with mainstream media, centered gay white cisgender men. As Melissa M. Wilcox details, "early queer theorists were typically cisgender white men whose writing focused on other cisgender white men" (2021, 23). This bias within the queer community has been further perpetuated by "mainstream media's sanitized vision of sexual minorities: cisgender gay white men" (Chamberlain 2020, xvi). However, my evidence directly disputes that patriarchal dominion on camp, as my survey participants identifying as gay, lesbian, and/or queer all enjoy camp in nearly equal measure, although gay participants are not those with the strongest reported connection to camp. 52 percent ( $n = 651$ ) of the survey participants who identify as "queer" strongly agree with the statement that they enjoy "camp-y" horror films, whereas 4.6 percent ( $n = 57$ ) strongly disagree or disagree with the same statement. 48.7 percent ( $n = 290$ ) of the participants who identify as "lesbian" strongly agree with the same statement, with 4 percent ( $n = 24$ ) strongly disagreeing or disagreeing. 48.5 percent ( $n = 626$ ) of those participants who identify as "gay" strongly agree with the same statement, whereas 6.1 percent ( $n = 78$ ) strongly disagree or disagree.<sup>40</sup> Similarly, people of all gender identification categories enjoy camp, with genderqueer people demonstrating a slightly stronger affinity toward camp than those who are cisgender.<sup>41</sup> The following statistics represent the survey participants who "strongly agree" with the statement that they enjoy "camp-y" horror films:

- 56.6 percent ( $n = 108$ ) of those who identify as "genderqueer man"
- 50.7 percent ( $n = 107$ ) of those who identify as "genderqueer person"

---

<sup>40</sup> The demographic sexual orientation data for the survey participants who "strongly agree" or "agree" with the statement that they enjoy "camp-y" horror films are as follows: 82.3 percent ( $n = 1,062$ ) of those who identify as gay; 81.2 percent ( $n = 483$ ) of those who identify as lesbian; 84.4 percent ( $n = 1,056$ ) of those who identify as queer; 79.1 percent ( $n = 1,129$ ) of those who identify as bisexual; 78.1 percent ( $n = 667$ ) of those who identify as pansexual; 75 percent ( $n = 21$ ) of those who identify as heterosexual; 78.1 percent ( $n = 364$ ) of those who identify as polyamorous; and 74.9 percent ( $n = 322$ ) of those who identify as asexual.

<sup>41</sup> The demographic gender identity data for the survey participants who "strongly agree" or "agree" with the statement that they enjoy "camp-y" horror films is as follows: 87.4 percent of genderqueer men ( $n = 167$ ); 83.4 percent of cisgender men ( $n = 1,006$ ); 81 percent of genderqueer people ( $n = 171$ ); 80 percent of non-binary people ( $n = 641$ ); 79.7 percent of agender people ( $n = 161$ ); 78.6 percent of cisgender women ( $n = 1,054$ ); 78 percent of genderqueer women ( $n = 227$ ); 77.8 percent of transsexual people ( $n = 28$ ); 76 percent of transgender women ( $n = 111$ ); and 73.9 percent of transgender men ( $n = 246$ ).

- 49.2 percent ( $n = 394$ ) of those who identify as “non-binary person”
- 47.5 percent ( $n = 96$ ) of those who identify as “agender”
- 46.8 percent ( $n = 627$ ) of those who identify as “cisgender woman”
- 46.4 percent ( $n = 560$ ) of those who identify as “cisgender man”

This data, all together, demonstrates that the wide spectrum of queer horror fans has a relationship with camp, affirming that camp belongs to all those who embody nonnormative sexualities and/or genders. A survey participant succinctly summarizes that camp is “an important aesthetic and sensibility within queer culture” (46982544). Underscoring the long queer history of camp, Sue-Ellen Case shares that she learned camp from both lesbians and gay men: “A multitude of other experiences and discourses continued to enhance my queer thinking. Most prominent among them was the subcultural discourse of camp which I learned primarily from old dykes and gay male friends I knew in San Francisco, when I lived in the ghetto of bars” (1991, 1). This example from Case evidences inclusive queer theory from critics such as Andrea Weiss, who emphasizes that “camp is a tradition which belongs as much to women as well as men” (1993, 4). Camp theory’s focus on gay cisgender men upholds binaristic gendered fixations and perpetuates lesbian erasure, as well as obscures the entire queer community’s shared relationship to camp.

Queer horror fans of all ages have a relationship with camp, as evidenced by my survey data, which indicates that there is no statistically significant correlation between age and preference for camp in horror films.<sup>42</sup> The fact that all generations of queer horror fans enjoy camp in horror films indicates that, as Harry Benshoff and Sean Griffin argue in Queer Images: A History of Gay and Lesbian Film in America, “queer horror fans often enjoy the genre as camp” (2006, 77). This critical statement is further evidenced by the survey participants who write that “camp belongs with horror” (47122384) since they “go together” (47120553), “are synonymous” (47182539), “go hand in hand” (47125731 and 47121475), and “share a family in spectacle” (47122384). My survey data demonstrates that queers of all ages have a camp relationship to horror, which indicates that camp is deliberately disseminated and acquired, making it an explicitly political queer relationship to cisheteronormative hegemonic culture. Camp is deliberately disseminated by being taught, learned, exhibited, and absorbed within the queer community across generations in “two of camp’s most important channels of dissemination” which are “movie houses and gay bars” (Benshoff and Griffin 2006, 69).<sup>43</sup> While historically camp has been deliberately disseminated, those methods have remained covert and intangible, just as with queerness itself, which “is often transmitted covertly” (Muñoz 1996, 6). While indirectly shared, camp is an important aspect of the queer relationship to cisheteronormative society and its cultural products, including the horror genre, with queers of all ages finding agency and connection through a camp relationship to horror.

---

<sup>42</sup> There is also no statistically significant correlation between the highest level of education completed and preference for camp in horror films.

My survey data simultaneously highlights the relevance of camp across generations in queer culture and demonstrates its function as a relational tool for queers to joyously renegotiate and critique cisheteronormativity. Narrator Anthony Hudson posits that queers are “in an ideal position to interface with camp and to use camp and to speak through camp because, existing as queer people, we see the faultiness of structures, we see the limitations and we see the artificiality for what it is” (2020d, 13). A camp relationship not only to cultural artifacts but also with sociopolitical and institutional structures plays a significant role in queers’ formation of identity in opposition to hegemonic normativity. While numerous scholars have discussed camp as a queer mode of cultural critique (e.g., Meyer 1994, 10-11; Muñoz 1999, 119; Horn 2017, 16), my mixed-method data demonstrates a more nuanced queer relationship to camp. Camp is a survival strategy for queer people, a very specific relationship and way of negotiating a relationship with the world. Narrator Varrati expands upon this notion, illustrating the “queer uses of camp as tool of political protest” (Barounis 2018, 220) that works to joyously critique cisheteropatriarchy:

Camp is performative and camp is taking the piss out of society. Camp is Other. Camp is an otherness that holds a mirror up to the world at large and says, ‘Look how you are. Look how you’re acting. Isn’t it kind of outrageous?’ Who understands otherness better than queer people, because we’ve been othered our whole lives. So I think that we embrace camp because we understand the things that we were told growing up were so serious and so important—this is the word of law and this is how it is and how it shall always be—are kind of bullshit. Because all you have to do is take one step back to realize, ‘Oh, this is really dumb.’ And you’re using this dumbness to subjugate and marginalize and push people down. So camp becomes both an element of fun and absurdity, but also a weapon to criticize all of those structures that have held us down (2020, 6).

---

<sup>43</sup> The drag scene, from ballrooms and clubs to film and television, continues to be a significant community dispersal of camp. For example, RuPaul’s Drag Race and the global Drag Race franchises, since 2009, have introduced millions of young queers to camp culture and language.

This and other responses from queer horror fans indicates that camp is neither, as Benshoff claims, a “distanced and distancing reception practice” nor “a refusal to take seriously the serious forms and artifacts of dominant culture” (2008, 150). Instead, the camp relationship to horror for queer spectators is one that is joyously intimate and serious. A survey participant illustrates this camp relationship to horror, writing that “because I carry the sexual trauma of homophobia I think I gravitate towards campier movies, slashers, and older horror movies because of their over the top sensibility that to me adds to it rather than takes away from its power” (47109055). Queers fostering this camp relationship to horror find a queer truth within this cultural production from a cisheterosexual society. Thus, this study amends Philip Core’s oft-quoted axiom that “camp is a lie that tells the truth” (1984, 9) because my mixed-method data indicates that camp is the way queers find a truth in the lie. Queer people discover an empowering truth for their existence within the lie that cisheterodominant society tells us (including that horror film belongs to the young, heterosexual cisgender male, as established in previous chapters). As one survey participant explicitly notes in connecting camp to the queer embodiment: “I can embrace the weird and campy and outrageousness in horror movies more than my straight friends because these speak to my experience being gay” (46974343). Another affirms that “camp and excess definitely resonate with a queer subjectivity” (46951892). Since mainstream cultural production overwhelmingly reflects cisheteronormativity, cisheterosexual people do not have a survival imperative to create a relationship beyond the surface presented. Narrator Jason Edward Davis discusses how cisheterosexual cultural dominance prevents a heterosexual relationship to camp due to the comfort found in this normative status. Davis states:

I think camp is just something that’s inherently queer because it is about that layer in front of the layer. There’s this sincere thing and there’s the image, and then you are trying to tell the difference. When straight people respond to camp, they just get the joke because they assume it was meant for them. They’re like this isn’t any deeper than the funny that's happening because my life is the default. They're not thinking about their existence and how that relates—but all queer people have that as a default (2020, 32).

This also reflects how the coded, or subtextual, aspect of camp specifically resonates with queerness. Survey participants affirm this queer camp relationship through written comments, such as: “Maybe straight people just have no concept of subtext” (47043096); and “Very few straights get camp, but most gays do” (47124005).

This understanding by queer people that camp is a queer sensibility is affirmed by my survey data, which demonstrates that survey participants who have a camp relationship to horror also exhibit an increased awareness that their queerness affects their relationship to horror. An independent-sample t-test was conducted on survey participants' enjoyment of camp in the horror genre to compare participants who report that they have a different reaction to horror films (as compared with heterosexual viewers) to those who do not. A statistically significant difference exists in the enjoyment of camp in the horror genre between participants who report that they have a different reaction to horror films and those who do not ( $p < .000$ ). The results indicate that participants who more strongly enjoy camp are more likely to be those who report that they have a different reaction to horror films as compared with heterosexual viewers.<sup>44</sup> Additionally, there is a statistically significant difference in the enjoyment of camp in the horror genre between participants who feel that being queer influences their taste in horror films and those who do not ( $p < .000$ ). These results demonstrate that participants who more strongly enjoy camp are more likely to report that being queer influences their taste in horror films.<sup>45</sup> All combined, this data indicates that a horror spectator's queerness affects their relationship to camp and that knowingly possessing a camp relationship affects their relationship to horror.

---

<sup>44</sup> A statistically significant difference exists in the mathematical means between survey participants who report they have a different reaction to horror films than heterosexual viewers ( $M = 1.66$ ,  $SD = .871$ ) and those who do not ( $M = 1.94$ ,  $SD = .970$ ) compared with responses to the statement “I enjoy ‘camp-y’ horror films”;  $t(3426) = -9.436$ ,  $p < .000$ ,  $d = .30$ .

<sup>45</sup> An independent-samples t-test was conducted to compare participants' enjoyment of camp in the horror genre between participants who report that being queer influences their taste in horror films and those who do not. A statistically significant difference exists in the mathematical means between survey participants who report that being queer influences their taste in horror films ( $M = 1.66$ ,  $SD = .871$ ) and those who do not ( $M = 1.65$ ,  $SD = .870$ ) compared with responses to the statement “I enjoy ‘camp-y’ horror films”;  $t(3556) = -10.156$ ,  $p < .000$ ,  $d = .33$ .

The vast majority of queer horror fans have a camp relationship to horror, with statistically significant test results also demonstrating that these horror-loving queers are more engaged in horror fandom. Queer horror fans who have a camp relationship to horror consider themselves more knowledgeable about the horror genre, are more likely to collect horror films, and are more likely to purchase horror memorabilia and/or collectibles. The survey results indicate that participants who more strongly enjoy camp are more likely to be those who consider themselves knowledgeable about horror film due to the statistically significant difference in the score of enjoyment of camp in the horror genre between participants who consider themselves knowledgeable about horror film and those who do not ( $p < .000$ ).<sup>46</sup> The survey results indicate that participants who more strongly enjoy camp are more likely to be those who collect horror films, due to the statistically significant difference in the score of enjoyment of camp in the horror genre between participants who collect horror films in any formats (such as Blu-ray, DVD, LaserDisc, VHS, or any digital form) and those who do not ( $p < .000$ ). Further results demonstrate that participants who more strongly enjoy camp are more likely to be those who purchase horror memorabilia and/or collectibles. There is a statistically significant difference in the score of enjoyment of camp in the horror genre between participants who purchase horror memorabilia and/or collectibles and those who do not ( $p < .000$ ).<sup>47</sup> Queer horror fans actively forge a camp relationship to the horror genre, with the data also indicating these same horror-loving queers are more actively engaged with horror fandom, such as obtaining horror knowledge and collecting horror films and memorabilia.

Queer horror fans who possess a camp relationship to horror also have small and medium, yet highly statistically significant, positive correlations with the following statements: “Horror films make me laugh” ( $r_s = .32, p < .000$ ); “I

---

<sup>46</sup> An independent-samples t-test is conducted to compare participants’ enjoyment of camp in the horror genre between participants who consider themselves knowledgeable about the horror genre and those who do not. A statistically significant difference exists in the mathematical means between survey participants who consider themselves knowledgeable about horror film ( $M = 1.74, SD = .904$ ) and those who do not ( $M = 1.98, SD = 1.001$ ) compared with responses to the statement “I enjoy ‘camp-y’ horror films”;  $t(862) = -5.659, p < .000, d = .25$ .

<sup>47</sup> An independent-samples t-test is conducted to compare participants’ enjoyment of camp in the horror genre between participants who purchase horror memorabilia and/or collectibles and those who do not. A statistically significant difference exists in the mathematical means between survey participants who purchase horror memorabilia and/or collectibles ( $M = 1.68, SD = .857$ ) and those who do not ( $M = 1.95, SD = 1.012$ ) compared with responses to the statement “I enjoy ‘camp-y’ horror films”;  $t(4011) = -8.981, p < .000, d = .29$ .

watch horror films for the special/practical/visual effects and make-up” ( $r_s = .22$ ,  $p < .000$ ); and “I most enjoy watching horror films with queer audiences” ( $r_s = .27$ ,  $p < .000$ ). The data that horror-loving queers laugh at horror films provides statistical evidence for the connection between laughter and horror (see figure 4.4). The data also indicates that queer spectators with a camp relationship to horror films watch to experience the heightened and exaggerated artifice of special/practical/visual effects and make-up in horror’s extreme maimings and murders, which evidences David Bergman’s conclusion that camp “favors ‘exaggeration,’ ‘artifice,’ and ‘extremity’” (1993, 5). Narrator Kim Thompson confirms this, stating:

My horror of choice isn’t often something that is documentary style or based on something that I feel could really happen, or very drawn-out torture or human trauma. I don’t really enjoy things that are too parallel to what I might read in the news or things that are linked to stuff that I see already in society that I think is awful. I’m not really drawn to things where a woman is being tortured and abused. I can open a newspaper for that. It’s not just all horror that I necessarily find comforting and an escape. It tends to be supernatural stuff or things with great practical effects or things that are theatrical and camp and dramatic and visually nice to look at with an element of silly horror gore on the side (2020, 19).

These aesthetic pleasures of horror films are enhanced for queer spectators with a camp relationship to horror when viewed amongst a queer audience, as evidenced by the data showing queer horror fans with a camp relationship to horror most enjoy watching horror films with queer audiences. Queer horror fans who have a camp relationship to horror also have small and medium, yet highly statistically significant, positive correlations with three horror subgenres: horror comedy or parody ( $r_s = .31$ ,  $p < .000$ ), monster movies ( $r_s = .20$ ,  $p < .000$ ), and slashers ( $r_s = .22$ ,  $p < .000$ ).<sup>48</sup> These results indicate that participants who more strongly enjoy camp are more likely to be those who love or like horror comedies, monster movies, and slashers.<sup>49</sup> The horror comedy subgenre has a direct and explicit connection to laughter as a part of the camp relationship to horror, whereas monster movies and slashers both connect to queer spectators through the camp relationship’s manifestation in the coded Other as well as camp exaggeration and extremity found in horror special effects.<sup>50</sup> For queer horror spectators, horror’s heightened narratives and aesthetic excesses are cathartic. As a survey participant shares: “I tend to go for the more ‘unreal’ things like slashers or monsters where usually the survival of someone is guaranteed, which isn’t always the case with real life” (47079406). Queer spectators actively transform horror’s myriad manifestations of violence—whether psychological, physical, or indeed supernatural or spiritual—and horror’s presentations of monstrosity, victimization, and survival (such as the final girl trope) through a camp relationship. This camp-horror nexus connects with queer embodiment, facilitating queers across the spectrum to find comfort, experience empowerment, claim representation, and foster healing.

---

<sup>48</sup> There is no statistically significant relationship between queer horror fans who exhibit a camp relationship to horror and the following horror subgenres: extreme, found footage, cyber/internet, home invasion, and psychological. In other words, the data suggests that a camp relationship to horror is not an indicator of whether a queer spectator will like or dislike these five subgenres.

<sup>49</sup> A statistically significant relationship with a small effect size exists between queer horror fans who exhibit a camp relationship to horror with the following horror subgenres: body horror ( $r_s = .12$ ,  $p < .000$ ), witchcraft ( $r_s = .13$ ,  $p < .000$ ), werewolf ( $r_s = .15$ ,  $p < .000$ ), zombie ( $r_s = .10$ ,  $p < .000$ ), vampire ( $r_s = .14$ ,  $p < .000$ ), Roger Corman/American International Pictures ( $r_s = .17$ ,  $p < .000$ ), Hammer Horror ( $r_s = .17$ ,  $p < .000$ ), Universal Horror ( $r_s = .18$ ,  $p < .000$ ), and Silent Horror

Horror films make me laugh

FIGURE 4.4. Bar graph that indicates survey participants’ level of agreement or disagreement for the following statement: horror films make me laugh.

4.10 Camp Laughter as a Trauma Processor

This research is specifically concerned with queer camp, as the qualitative and quantitative research data evidences that camp has a place in the queer spectator relationship to horror representationally and figuratively. Esther Newton recognizes camp as “a system of humor,” a “system of laughing at one’s incongruous position instead of crying,” in which “humor does not cover up, it transforms” (1979, 109; italics in the original). Camp’s transformative function alleviates the pain of queer societal incongruity by connecting and bonding queer community through finding humor in shared suffering. As established, while the horror genre provides a cinematic space for queers to work through trauma, the camp relationship queers have with horror films provides further “catharsis and ease[s] the burden” for queers “living in an oppressive society” (McElroy 2016, 298). Queer horror spectators both receive and create a camp relationship to horror through the heightened reality of the genre and in the over-the-top characters in the films.<sup>51</sup> Even with the advancement of queer rights since the 1970s, queer populations, particularly BIPOC and/or trans*, continue to experience personal, professional, and political discrimination and violence. Queer people carry collective and individual traumas due to these pervasive and wounding societal threats. This is critical to reiterate because queer trauma finds expression through the camp relationship queer spectators have with the horror genre. The reason camp remains “political” is because it is “a means of communication and survival” that “exaggerates and therefore diffuses real threats” (Bronski 1984, 42-43). As a survey participant writes “there’s something horrific and traumatic about many of our [queer] experiences and therefore I think horror tells them in a way we can appreciate artistically” (47109055). Even though Sontag capitulates that camp may concern “grave matters” (1964, 42), her insistence of camp’s apoliticality bypasses its ability to excavate the politics of queer joy and rage, healing and trauma.<sup>52</sup> As narrator Joe Fejeran asserts in explaining camp’s complex nuances: “Camp is not necessarily about drawing true to reality. It’s about drawing the caricature and emphasizing those elements. And it’s even more effective when you’re dealing with serious subjects” (2020, 36).

( $r_s = .16, p < .000$ ). In other words, these results indicate that participants who more strongly enjoy camp are more likely to be those who love or like the aforementioned subgenres.

<sup>50</sup> As a queer spectator writes, “monster and slasher narratives can be cathartic for me as a queer viewer” (47103058), indicating a specifically queer connection to the subgenres.

While there has been much focus on the joyful side of camp,<sup>53</sup> my

---

<sup>51</sup> Underscoring spectatorial agency in the camp relationship, Charles Ludlam posits that “camp is a way of looking at things, never what’s looked at” (1992, 227). This study deploys and empirically affirms Ludlam’s understanding of camp as an active queer lens.

<sup>52</sup> While this research focus concentrates on the queer spectator’s camp relationship to horror, expressed particularly through laughter, it does not fully investigate the root of all sources of a camp relationship to hegemonic culture, which may be motivated by rage (Ludlam 1992, 254), melancholy (Taylor 2019, 100), and/or joy (Crosby and Lynn 2017, 60).

<sup>53</sup> Even though camp’s seriousness is often obscured by humor, camp may even exist without humor. For example, Cynthia Barounis writes about the camp in The Witch: A New England Folktale (2015) and Daniel Humphrey considers the camp possibilities of The Exorcist (1973). As Barounis argues “camp humorlessness makes ample space for depression, despair, anxiety, self-pity, and rage” (2018, 222).

qualitative data indicates that camp has a more complex and nuanced relationship with cultural artifacts. Thousands of written survey responses, coupled with the oral histories, demonstrate that queer celebration and trauma are inextricably entwined in queer spectators' encounters with, understanding of, and appreciation of horror films. In fact, the queer spectator's camp relationship with horror demonstrates Jodie Taylor's observation that "camp is employed as a sign of a repressed alterity, which is transformed through parody, theatricality and carnivalesque spectacle into an empowering queer critique of dominant morality and social exclusion" (2012, 77).<sup>54</sup> The camp relationship to horror is directly established through queer alterity; queers use camp to reinterpret normativity to fit their nonnormative reality as an Other, a status the majority of queer horror fans are acutely aware of possessing, as the mixed-method data presented in Chapter 3 evidences.<sup>55</sup> As a participant writes: "I think we respond to the camp of the genre in ways heterosexuals do not. I also think we relate to the underdog fighting back from the hero perspective while on the flip side we relate to the monster, rejected from society but born anew and ready to subvert the order of things" (46854175). Horror-loving queers use camp to transform horror, knowing that "camp has always, to some extent, urged us to take trauma and its aftermath seriously" (Barounis 2018, 217). Being queer in a cisheteronormative society creates insidious trauma, which can be expressed and healed for queers through a shared and bonding use of camp. Narrator Fejeran emphasizes the bond he feels with other queers through his camp relationship: "For me, camp and queerness have always been my way to relate to others" (2020, 38). Part of camp's power comes from queers' ability to turn a shared tragedy and pain into laughter. Camp's heightened emotionality and exaggeration renders trauma less painful for spectators because it rejects the norms of appropriate behavior in response to tragedy and trauma. In Halperin's words:

Camp undoes the solemnity with which heterosexual society regards tragedy, but camp doesn't evade the reality of the suffering that gives rise to tragedy. If anything, camp is a tribute to its intensity. Camp returns to the scene of trauma and replays that trauma on a ludicrously amplified scale—so as to drain it of its pain and, in so doing, to transform it (2012, 200).

---

<sup>54</sup> As well, Richard Niles emphasizes that camp can "be used as a means of communication and empowerment within gay and lesbian communities" (2004, 42).

<sup>55</sup> 55.8 percent of the survey participants relate to representations of the monstrous. Specifically, 11.5 percent ( $n = 473$ ) of survey participants identify with the "monster" in horror films, while 44.3 percent ( $n = 1,818$ ) of the survey participants identify with both the "monster" and the "victim" in horror films.

Horror can help heal queer trauma through its many methods of transformation, one of which is laughter—an essential way queers process trauma through their camp relationship to horror.

Laughter is an exterior expression of humor, which “constitutes the strategy of camp: a means of dealing with a hostile environment and, in the process, of defining a positive identity” (Babuscio 1977, 47). The queer camp relationship to horror actively creates a specific levity that expresses itself in outward laughter in reaction to horrific scenarios. This simultaneously distinguishes queer horror spectatorship and empowers queer identity and community, particularly experienced when gathered together in movie theatres and laughing, an act which is at once bonding/inclusive and exclusionary. Julian Hanich explains that laughter “sometimes has an exclusionary function: ‘Look, this—and precisely this—is funny for us, but not for others!’” (2014b, 51). In other words, queer people are both bonded together over their communal laughter and separated from others by it. The queer camp relationship to horror creates a shared nonnormative bond of laughter for queer audiences that is often unavailable in cisheteronormative audiences. Queer horror fans provide examples of this phenomenon in describing watching horror films such as What Ever Happened to Baby Jane? (1962) or Strait-Jacket (1964)<sup>56</sup> with queer audiences (as opposed to cisheteronormative audiences). “We [queers] also recognize the camp factor in movies more readily—What Ever Happened to Baby Jane is a comedy and a horror in equal measure, for example” (46867851). “Straight people seem to love blood and gore for the violence, not the spectacle/pageantry. For that reason, they also don’t seem to like classics like Baby Jane” (47100776). The difference in experience also manifests in viewing a horror film and sharing communal laughter (within a queer audience) versus viewing a horror film and being the only one to laugh (amongst a normative audience). The laughter is an important part of the camp relationship to horror because queers find a cathartic release through both laughter and screaming, as a survey participant elucidates: “The best horror for me is the stuff that makes you scream but also laugh. There is a release to it I enjoy” (47291353). A camp relationship to horror liberates and releases through the catharsis that comes from screaming and laughing at horror. To this end, “[Esther] Newton’s idea about camp’s cathartic relationship to being queer in a world hostile to one’s queerness” (McElroy 2016, 299) directly links camp to both laughter and pain. Newton, an anthropologist, details camp as a queer tool that can function to alleviate the pain of being a queer Other in a cishetero-normative world: “Only by fully embracing the stigma [of queerness] itself can one neutralize the sting and make it laughable. Not all references to the stigma are campy, however. Only if it is pointed out as a joke is it camp, although there is no requirement that the jokes be gentle or friendly” (1979,111). As Newton indicates, camp exists in many forms, laced with a sharpness and pain, of which horror reflects one type. The queer spectator’s camp relationship to horror creates queer inclusion through laughter, an intelligent and meaningful celebration, thereby both processing and excluding cisheteronormativity.<sup>57</sup> As one survey participant reflects:

---

<sup>56</sup> What Ever Happened to Baby Jane? (1962), Lady in a Cage (1964), Strait-Jacket (1964), and Die! Die! My Darling! (1965) are horror films also categorized as Grande Dame Guignol films, which are films featuring old Hollywood stars, such as Bette Davis and Joan Crawford, no longer in their patriarchally marketable “prime.” This subgenre is also called Psycho-biddy or, the even more misogynistic terms, hagsploitation or hag horror.

I participate in queer readings of texts along the lines outlined by Alexander Doty, or along the lines of a camp reading as discussed by Barbara Klinger. So, I recognize those themes or performative elements of the film that can be read as queer because of my own political investments and personal experiences that may not occur during a viewing of the film by a heterosexual viewer (47725637).

While camp belongs to subjective individual perspectives, camp serves the queer community through both inclusionary and exclusionary functions in their relationship to horror. Through this camp relationship to horror, queers create a sense of belonging and healing through shared laughter.

4.11 The Potential of Camp

This study evidences the intersection of queerness and horror, in part through queers’ camp relationship to horror, which also creates a space in the academic discourse for camp’s legitimacy as a queer relational tool with the horror genre.

---

<sup>57</sup> William Paul correctly comments on the “exclusionary” nature of camp but misinterprets camp’s function when he states that “camp condescendingly celebrates the vacuousness of the art work” (Paul 1994, 71).

This powerful reclamation of space functions as did Nielsen's work to "unghost" lesbian camp (2016, 131). Nielsen renders visible lesbian camp, while simultaneously calling on future researchers to "sample a variety of gender and sexual identities to uncover which queer personalities are drawn to camp" (2016, 131). This study heeds Nielsen's call and demonstrates that the diverse spectrum of horror-loving queers' relationship to the horror genre is inseparable from their relationship to camp. For the queer spectator, a camp relationship to horror exists irrespective of the quality of a film, whether a horror film is "good," "bad," "good bad," or, indeed, "bad good." Numerous scholars write about the intentional or unintentional camp of bad films (e.g., Ross 1989; Benschhoff 2008), constructing a false dichotomy between filmic failure and camp success. However, a film being a failure is not a primary factor in queer spectators' camp relationship to horror. For some survey participants, their "queer (and camp) sensibility influences [their] selection and enjoyment of horror films" (47101199). For others, they note their queerness as the reason they "appreciate camp, body horror, and politics in horror differently" (47808132). Regardless, the queer spectator's camp relationship to horror is not simply relegated to failed films or humorous subgenres. The shared attributes between the horror genre and camp, which queer spectators recognize and relate to, help horror-loving queers process trauma and connect within queer horror communities.

Even though the queer relationship to camp is subjective and individual, it becomes shared and known when queers express it, as in the camp-horror nexus. As Oliver-Hopkins astutely determines in analyzing camp representation in the film House of 1000 Corpses, "the camp-horror nexus suggest[s] the ideological work that needs to be done both covertly and overtly for a more equitable society to emerge from the relentless and aggressively homogenous dominant culture of twenty-first-century America" (2017, 165-166). Whereas Oliver-Hopkins uses the "white trash stereotype" to critique "hegemonic notions of socially acceptable and unacceptable behavior" (2017, 165), this study similarly situates the queer camp-horror nexus as counter-hegemonic. The camp relationship to horror established by queer horror spectators functions simultaneously as a form of queer community inclusion and "a queer critique of heteronormativity" (Benschhoff 2008, 161). Camp, understood as an act of resistance to overcome queer marginalization and trauma, proves its continued value as a “tactic that can be used to deconstruct the heterosexual presumptions of dominant culture” (Benshoff and Griffin 2006, 70). Camp has a place in not only textual, intertextual, extratextual, and paratextual readings by queer spectators, but also the drag artistry of performers such as Peaches Christ and Carla Rossi, as I present and analyze in Chapter 5. As a survey participant elucidates: “Horror frequently crosses over into camp and I feel that the experience of watching a horror movie in a drag performance setting allows that aspect of horror to shine” (47787515). For queer horror fans, the potential of camp is its use as a powerful aesthetic, political, and performative relational tool for us to thrive, not simply survive, as nonnormative people.

Chapter 5

Drag Me to Hell: Queer Performance and Live Cinema

Horror and drag are both fringe entertainment and a match made in hell (47114640).

I think that queer people enjoy camp because it's a heightened reality. But it's heightened reality with the message that is poking fun at the things that we would not be able to normally say in 'straight conversation.' And I think that also speaks to why horror and drag are connected because, and again, it's the theatre of the heightened reality—it's utilizing the art to say something and to say it in the most over-the-top strange or absurd or powerful way you can (Varrati 2020, 6-7).

I feel that a drag pre-show taps into the disruptive, queer nature of horror films, and lightens the mood so that the focus is on the campy fun of horror (47112178).

I've always picked up on the queer elements of horror, but as a lot of horror fans are straight cis men it can be alienating since I know we're not necessarily seeing the movie in the same way. Having a queen introduce the film lets me know I'm in a queer-friendly place and sets the film up for a non heteronormative viewing (48753875).

The mixed-method data presented in Chapter 3 demonstrates not only that queer horror spectators share overall similarities in their opinions, habits, and tastes, but also how the presented data exists in contrast to previous empirical audience studies on the horror spectator. Chapter 4 has then elaborated on the queer relationship to the horror genre through trauma and camp. Chapter 5 will function as an extended illustration and interrogation of the camp relationship queer spectators have with horror by examining an entirely campy and decidedly queer engagement with horror: drag performers<sup>1</sup> who present horror films to queer audiences and perform a show before the screening.<sup>2</sup> This examination will lead to a critical academic connection to live cinema studies. Analyzing drag, a highly political and essentially queer performance art anchored in camp, including drag performers as horror hosts, has proven imperative in order to understand the phenomenological and theoretical foundations of queer live cinema events. An examination of Peaches Christ's Midnight Mass and Carla Rossi's Queer Horror (in San Francisco, California and Portland, Oregon respectively),<sup>3</sup> including these queer events' historical precedents, reveals how "event-led cinema" (Vivar 2018, 121) firmly includes queer performance and drag horror host exhibition in the emerging field of live cinema, and further illustrates how "cinema makes queer spaces possible"—both on the screen<sup>4</sup> and in the auditorium (Schoonover and Galt 2016, 3). These queer horror exhibition events should be understood as vital examples of live cinema.<sup>5</sup> This chapter, therefore, argues for the significance of queer interventions for live cinema studies.<sup>6</sup> Phenomenological theories of

---

<sup>1</sup> While a drag queen, a cis gay man “impersonating” a woman, is the most common perception of a drag performer, the entire drag umbrella more extensively represents a wide range of performers, including “drag kings (typically queer cisgender women and trans men who perform as men), bio femmes (sometimes called bio queens or faux queens, cisgender women who perform stereotypes of femininity onstage as a critical practice), bio males (also known as bio kings or faux kings, cisgender men who critically perform stereotypes of masculinity), genderfuck artists who challenge binary understandings of gender through androgyny or deliberate mashups of traditionally masculine and feminine characteristics, and other types of gender performance too many to name” (Horowitz 2020, 2-3).

<sup>2</sup> The interest of this chapter is on what the collective queer live cinema experience enables, not what it prevents. Invariably, people who do not identify as queer attend these live cinema events; however, this study is not concerned with their experiences, as this is a decidedly queer project that centers queerness over the cisheteronormative, which exists at the center of society.

---

<sup>3</sup> Midnight Mass and Queer Horror have been amongst my favorite queer spaces that I have ever enjoyed as a participant and a participant researcher respectively. Both have significantly impacted my relationship with horror and strengthened my understanding of the queer bond to horror.

<sup>4</sup> When a film includes a queer story or character, the creators make a space in cisheteronormative society for a nonnormative existence. Cinema, as both a cultural artifact and theatrical space, allows queers to see themselves in the narratives and characters within a film text that is projected onto a theatre screen.

<sup>5</sup> An overwhelming 87.8 percent of queer horror spectators would like to see a drag performer introduce a horror film, while less than 16 percent of the survey participants have experienced such an event. Even though the COVID-19 pandemic has complicated the proliferation of queer live cinema events (and therefore queer spectators' ability to experience in-person screenings presented by drag horror hosts), drag performers, such as Bunny Galore, Mr Wesley Dykes, and Adam All, have continued to entertain queer audiences by introducing horror films streaming online.

<sup>6</sup> The very liveness and the uniqueness of the queer live cinema events analyzed in this chapter imbues them with cultural value, at times considered to be subcultural capital. The subcultural capital discourse, developed across numerous scholars, analyzes how particular fans earn a rarefied status based on their participation in or experience of select events that are deemed subculturally valuable, thereby conferring on the attendee an elevated social status (see Thornton 1995; Mark Jancovich 2002; Matt Hills 2015; Pett 2021, et al.). Sarah Thornton, the scholar who coined the term, explains that subcultural capital "confers status on its owner in the eyes of the relevant beholder" (1995, 27) and that this capital is "a currency which correlates with and legitimizes unequal statuses" (1995, 163). Subcultural capital, considered to be both embodied and objectified (Thornton 1995, 27; Hills 2010, 89), is a hierarchical concept that is imbued with capitalistic notions and discussed in capitalism's terms. An individual can claim, invest, monetize, accumulate, negotiate, accrue, generate, trade on, perform, display, and/or demonstrate subcultural capital; conversely, a person's subcultural capital may be considered to be eroded, diluted, unrecognized, and/or diminished. The theoretical employment of subcultural capital, thus, segregates and ranks a fan community into sub-communities with stratified social statuses. This work purposely and pointedly does not employ the fracturing and hierarchical concept of subcultural capital to understand the queer horror spectator because, as discussed in Chapter 1, this study prioritizes data-based collective consensus and community cohesion over any individual (and subcultural) status or gains. This study, moreover, aims to diminish any perceived value of queer live cinema events by functioning as an inspiration for more queer drag liveness, sharedness, and laughter, as well as cult and failure theories, will be considered and should be understood as rhizomatically interlaced throughout subsequent topics of the carnivalesque, drag, horror hosts, and queer events. This scavengered theoretical framework works with the mixed-method data of this study to define the qualities of and evidence the importance of queer live cinema events.

5.1 Establishing Queer Performance as Live Cinema

This chapter creates an understanding for queer live cinema by demonstrating how and why key types of queer performance, including drag and horror host events, are categorically live cinema. Live cinema, distilled down to its simplest definition, is any exhibition that “involves some form of simultaneous live action or addition to a cinema screening” (Atkinson and Kennedy 2019, 339). For as long as there has been film exhibition, there has been a history of live accompaniment or “liveness;” this exhibition history has been documented by scholars such as Barbara Klinger, Richard Maltby, Mark Walker, and Charles Musser. Atkinson and Kennedy acknowledge that while live cinema studies is a new field, cinema exhibition, going back to exhibition in music halls and vaudeville venues, incorporated live elements, stating: “Our examination of live cinema phenomena insists upon the recognition of these contemporary practices as having very clear antecedents in the early emergence of film and cinema” (2019, 336). Live cinema is an emergent field of study, with the collection Live Cinema: Cultures, Economies, Aesthetics edited by Sarah Atkinson and Helen W. Kennedy (2018) being the pivotal text that develops the theoretical foundation for this evolving discipline.<sup>7</sup> Live cinema is commonly understood as “a film screening utilising additional performance or interactivity inspired by the content of the film” (Live Cinema in the UK 2016, 4) or a screening “that escapes beyond the boundaries of the auditorium” (Atkinson performers to create horror exhibition events so that many more queers can experience watching a horror film in the theatre with a queer audience. Stated differently, whilst the “rarity” of an event is argued to enhance its subcultural capital (Hills 2010, 91), this research is written and will be shared with the goal to seed community unity, thereby diminishing any externally perceived individual social status and encouraging shared queer horror experiences.

---

<sup>7</sup> Alongside Live Cinema, the following works form live cinema studies’ methodological, theoretical, and ideological foundation: Atkinson’s 2014 study, Beyond the Screen: Emerging Cinema and Engaging Audiences, about the UK’s Secret Cinema; the Live Cinema Network; the 2016 special issue of Participations journal; and the “Live Cinema in the UK” Conference Report.

and Kennedy 2016a, 139), although the nascent field remains multifarious and ephemeral due to the range of interpretations and applications. I argue that Midnight Mass and Queer Horror are enhanced and participatory live cinema experiences that “sit at the exciting intersection of a number of different art forms — film, music, theatre and performing arts” (Atkinson and Kennedy 2018, 9). Both Midnight Mass and Queer Horror incorporate the exhibition of horror film, musical numbers and lip syncs, curated preshow playlists, original theatrical horror parody skits, and queer performance art, all of which creates an enhanced “viewing experience [that] takes precedence over the film text itself” (Atkinson and Kennedy 2018, 20). Simply stated, the audience is drawn and attends not only for the film, but for the experience, as the live cinema viewing experience is “more immersive” (46895404) than a film alone.

Midnight Mass and Queer Horror, as live cinema events, bring to the fore a specific queer culture of horror fandom that celebrates horror and connects queers through campy drag performances, “solidifying the bonds between the Queer and the ‘queer’ (meaning uncanny)” (47110480). This chapter focuses on Midnight Mass and Queer Horror as live cinema case studies because they each embody an enhanced film viewing experience in exemplary ways. Also, pertinently, these are two live cinema event series at which I have been a regular attendee and my direct experience is that of a community “participant-observer” (Marchetti 2008, 417), having attended Midnight Mass in the late 1990s through the mid 2000s and Queer Horror ongoing since 2015. As well, Peaches Christ’s Midnight Mass and Carla Rossi’s Queer Horror are ideal queer live cinema events to examine, I argue, due to Peaches Christ being an internationally-recognized drag legend<sup>8</sup> and Queer Horror being “exclusively the only queer horror screening series in the United States” (Davis 2020, 26). While Midnight Mass and Queer Horror function as ideal case studies, a multitude of other queer live cinema events have existed, such as Queer Fear in Toronto,

---

<sup>8</sup> Peaches Christ is most often written about in the press as a legendary drag icon with a reach far beyond San Francisco, enjoying an ever-growing international reputation. Peaches Christ’s role as a horror/cult film maven is bolstered by appearances in documentary films about Divine, Showgirls, Jayne Mansfield, and Tura Satana. Peaches Christ’s creator Joshua Grannell is also a horror director, having written and directed numerous horror parody shorts starring Peaches Christ, including Season of the Troll (2001), A Nightmare on Castro Street (2002), and Whatever Happened to Peaches Christ? (2004). Grannell adapted his horror short film Grindhouse (2003) into his feature debut film All About Evil (2010). I was a part of Grannell’s “zero-budget” crew as Director of Photography for all of the aforementioned short films.

Canada, Miss McGee's Creature Feature (an "evening of glamour, gore and guffaws") in Tampa/St. Petersburg, Florida, and Make A Scene in Manchester, UK.<sup>9</sup> Queer live cinema events that exhibit horror films to queer audiences create a particular type of energy, regardless of film, location, or drag "horror host" performer.

Since visible, named, and known queer cultural productions such as these have existed only for a few decades (in part due to "out" queer spaces only existing since the late 1960s), live cinema events that combine queer production with queer reception create a uniquely queer space for horror exhibition. As Anthony Hudson (drag persona Carla Rossi) explains, "even if the het-ero-sexuals [said slowly and humorously inflected] or the straight audience shows up now to support [Queer Horror], it is under the understanding that this is a queer experience and this is a queer space" (2020c, 15). Queer artists who create a specifically queer culture with enhanced horror exhibition, or live cinema, events for queer audiences embody John Fiske's theory of excorporation—"the process by which the subordinate make their own culture out of the resources and commodities provided by the dominant system" (2003, 114). While all cultural production uses the material and means of the neoliberal capitalist cisheteropatriarchy, a rebellious subversion of capitalistic products permeates queer cultural production. This study, then, builds on Andrew Ross's concept that "camp and cult appear to side with the exploited labourer in the struggle to gain control over the meaning of cultural products, and their outrageousness becomes a conscious attitude of revolt" (2008, 53). Inherent to both Midnight Mass and Queer Horror is a deliberate and enthusiastic subversion of mainstream attitudes about and understandings of horror film as well as dominant culture and politics.

---

<sup>9</sup> Queer Fear, Miss McGee's Creature Feature, and Make A Scene are also queer live cinema events that screen horror films with drag performers as the host. These three queer live cinema events are examples to demonstrate that queer live cinema events exist outside of both the West Coast and the United States.

FIGURE 5.1. This portrait of Peaches Christ highlights her love of the horror genre. Photo by David Ayllon. Image courtesy of Peaches Christ Productions.

Based on an examination of Peaches Christ's and Carla Rossi's event series' temporary reclamation<sup>10</sup> of spaces for queer audiences, this study argues for and demonstrates the critical role of drag in queered horror film events. Midnight Mass and Queer Horror epitomize these queer live cinema events, which allows this work to incorporate a significant queer cultural production into live cinema studies. This assertion is further evidenced by queer performers who have been at the forefront of live cinema dating back to, at least, The Cockettes and The Rocky Horror Picture Show, both of which will be historically situated in later sections. A concise historiographic examination of queered film exhibition additionally illustrates how queer drag performers have been at the forefront of live cinema and the experience economy (Pine and Gilmore 1998). Queer exhibition flourished prior to academic terms such as "live cinema" and "the experience economy," illustrating the retroactive application of an academic term to a cultural art that has long existed and flourished under the groundbreaking work of a marginalized group. Importantly, my oral history interviews with Joshua Grannell/Peaches Christ and Anthony Hudson/Carla Rossi, alongside interviews with Queer Horror's resident artist Jason Edward Davis and two regular Queer Horror audience members, investigate and underscore that "what [the] audience experiences in the moment of engagement is crucial to the exploration of the cultural significance of Live Cinema" (Atkinson and Kennedy 2018, 13). The historic queer legacies of The Cockettes and The Rocky Horror Picture Show are important to not only the nascent field of live cinema studies, but also both Grannell and Hudson, as directly claimed by both performers. In other words, queer live cinema events of the past directly connect to queer live cinema events today and, furthermore, the live cinema events of today will influence the queer live cinema experiences of the future. About this future, Queer Horror regular and narrator Kaitlyn Stodola notes the need to create a queer horror space in their life since they have moved away from Portland, Oregon: "I want to make my own Queer Horror. I wanna make my own space . . . Now that I've had that, I don't want to give it up. So I will fucking make it if I have to" (2020, 26-27). Queer live cinema events such as <sup>10</sup> I employ the term reclamation in this chapter with an intended meaning beyond its dictionary definition: to claim something that was never yours in the first place. This shift in meaning is intentional because both the queer live cinema events under study are serialized events that regularly return to claim a queer space (temporarily), and it is assertively political to then name that action as queer reclamation.

---

Queer Horror have an impact, specifically a queer cultural significance, that creates a queer space with both individual and shared meanings. Within this context, this study positions that the horror host works of Joshua Grannell, as Peaches Christ, and Anthony Hudson, as Carla Rossi, constitute a distinctive queer interpretation of live cinema and contribution to live cinema studies, expanding what is defined and understood by it. Midnight Mass and Queer Horror as live cinema events, determined by key works in Live Cinema, also further the phenomenological understanding of queer performance by building on theories of liveness and sharedness, the carnivalesque, and cult cinema.

FIGURE 5.2. A “witchy” portrait of Carla Rossi. Photo by Jason Edward Davis. Image courtesy of Anthony Hudson.

5.2 The Phenomenology of Queer Live Cinema

5.2.1 Queer Liveness and Sharedness

The term liveness is precisely what categorizes particular exhibition experiences as live cinema. Philip Auslander establishes the significant characteristics of liveness on which this argument is built. A clear parameter for defining liveness is the “physical co-presence of performers and audience” (2008, 61), which is found in a wide range of performances, from theatres to streets. Furthermore, for an event to possess liveness, it must be presented and seen in the same moment, possessing “temporal simultaneity of production and reception” (Auslander 2008, 61). The physical co-presence and temporal simultaneity of liveness, then, create an “experience in the moment” (Auslander 2008, 61). Thus, liveness is predicated on those three characteristics to be contained in an impermanent, in-person performative interaction. Live cinema experiences are difficult to document in part because their very “liveness” resists expression and live performance itself is “a language that resists capture” (Hudson 2020d, 10). Hudson further contends that a live cinema performance like theirs is like witchcraft. It’s the Sabbath. It’s the magic circle. It’s a place removed from time and space that only exists for us in that moment . . . But you’ll remember it and that will impact you and that will impact how you access other experiences like that and the things you seek out . . . And I think that’s what all theatre should be striving to do—to make something that is really special and removed from time (2020d, 10).

Midnight Mass and Queer Horror are live cinema events crafted, respectively, by Grannell and Hudson; therefore, examining their audiences demonstrates how queer audiences affect the collective live cinema experience and adds to the “limited attention devoted to the collective cinema experience” (Hanich 2018, 70). In The Audience Effect: On the Collective Cinema Experience (2018), Julian Hanich centers the audience, not the film text, to theorize phenomenologically the collective cinema experience. Queer audiences are aware of live cinema’s experiential sharedness, as evidenced by survey participants who note their enjoyment of the “collective group experience” (47093051) while being at a queer horror screening with drag horror hosts and of the drag horror host who “instantly makes for such a stronger connection and a sense of unity” (47755040). Hanich’s phenomenological approach to audience studies puts the focus on cinema’s collectivity and its effect on the subjectively lived experience of watching a film in a darkened theatre with others (2014a, 343). This chapter employs Hanich’s approach specifically to examine the experience of being part of a queer audience when a drag performer introduces a horror film. In other words, Hanich’s phenomenological approach bypasses textual analysis in order to examine the collective audience responses to both the screened film and other audience members. The phenomenological nature of events like Queer Horror are evident to a host such as Hudson, who addresses the audience collectivity that engenders queer connection. In Hudson’s words:

While there is a grotesque side to that hive mentality, there is a really wonderful aspect, also, to it. At the other end of it is that we want to experience things collectively, and for the first time, we feel greater than ourselves—which we truly are because our bodies don’t end with our skin, our bodies extend into our communities, and into our ideology, and our history, and our environment. We become more aware of that when we’re in crowds, and when we’re experiencing something that we all care about together, and then we feel closer to each other. And the act of experiencing that, at its core, is what Queer Horror is about (2020d, 8).

Being queer in this cisheteronormative society can be an isolating experience for many; therefore, queer people often seek to find a space that fosters a queer connection whilst simultaneously and collectively celebrating horror film.<sup>11</sup> In fact, Hanich argues that “collectively watching a film with quiet attention should be regarded as a joint action” (2014a, 338). Sitting in a theatre with others to watch a film is a joint action, a shared activity. My study builds on Hanich’s theory by expanding the nature of a joint action, as evidenced by Midnight Mass and Queer Horror, examples of collectively watching a film as a joint action, but with boisterous and participatory attention. These live cinema events are joint-action celebrations of queerness and horror in the movie theatre.

According to Richard Maltby, “for most audiences for most of the history of cinema, their primary relationship with ‘the cinema’ has not been with individual movies-as-artefacts or as texts, but with the social experience of cinema” (2006, 85). Midnight Mass and Queer Horror are social experiences for queer people drawn together by horror films. These live cinema events even inform new ways of understanding audiences. According to Hanich, “quiet-attentive” and “expressive-diverted” are the two categories of collective cinematic viewing. Quiet-attentive audiences jointly yet silently concentrate on the filmic object, whereas the expressive-diverted viewing experience exists when an audience divides attention between the film and awareness of the audience. Significantly, these inverse types of viewing can coexist, as quiet-attentive and expressive-diverted collective viewing “can rapidly succeed each other and easily blend, fuse, morph into one another” (Hanich 2018, 65). Furthermore, both serve as joint actions of pleasure which are specifically “mediated by the film” (Hanich 2018, 134). Even when a queer spectator is expressively absorbed into the film, my research participants’ comments show that an attentive awareness of being a part of a queer audience collectively enjoying a horror film is phenomenologically part of queer horror fans’ live cinema experience.

---

<sup>11</sup> Narrator Stodola comments about queer collectivity differing from other non-queer viewing experiences: “I’ve always loved seeing horror movies in the theatre because seeing it with an audience is always so much more fun because everyone screams and everyone is really loud. And especially with the Queer Horror audience, everyone yells at the stuff that I would want to yell at, but that my mom would just be quiet through. It’s the stuff where people call out jokes or will scream at certain things. It’s just always so much more fun” (2020, 26).

The queer situatedness of the screening and audience is fundamental to the experience. Hanich notes that the “intimacy of the social connections may influence the collective experience,” which depends on whether the other audience members are known or anonymous (2014a, 341). As such, viewing a film as part of an audience of known people will afford a distinct experience from viewing alone amongst strangers.<sup>12</sup> This study of Midnight Mass, Queer Horror, Queer Fear, and other events by drag hosts presenting horror films to queer audiences offers a third audience category: a group that may be mostly anonymous but feels familiar through a shared cultural or social connection. Stated differently, the queer horror spectator finds, amongst an audience of predominantly anonymous people, a queer connection that makes those audience members feel known. Some of the survey participants explicitly address and describe this connection with comments such as: “sense of community built on seeing something that touched my little queer heart surrounded by people who related to the film in similar ways” (47079751); “we all understand each other” (47081172); “instantly created community around horror films, and recontextualized the experience as Queer” (46893626); “love the sense of community among the audience” (47645711). As such, this evidence demonstrates a celebratory awareness and appreciation of collectively experiencing horror as a member of an audience with like-minded queers.

---

<sup>12</sup> As evidenced by my survey data, when queer spectators watch horror films in a movie theatre, they overwhelmingly go with friend(s) and/or partner(s). Conversely, when watching horror films outside of the cinemagoing experience (such as at home), queer horror spectators watch horror films alone. For example, 77.6 percent ( $n = 3,162$ ), the vast majority, of queer spectators usually watch horror films at the cinema or movie theatre with friends or partners; whereas 15.5 percent ( $n = 630$ ) watch alone. The breakdown of with whom queer horror fans usually watch horror films is as follows: 34.7 percent ( $n = 1,414$ ) with a friend; 26.3 percent ( $n = 1,074$ ) with a partner; 7.7 percent ( $n = 312$ ) with an all or mostly LGBTQ+ group; 6 percent ( $n = 244$ ) with a mixed LGBTQ+ & heterosexual group; and 2.9 percent ( $n = 118$ ) with an all or mostly heterosexual group. 7 percent ( $n = 285$ ) of survey participants marked the question as not applicable, indicating that they do not regularly attend the cinema.

Queer people uniquely experience each other at events such as Midnight Mass and Queer Horror, which is in opposition to collective viewing in which “the audience predominantly experiences jointly without reflectively experiencing each other” (Hanich 2014a, 339). Survey participants highlight how live cinema events that combine queerness and horror with a drag horror host function to create uniquely shared queer horror experiences: “Drag queens at a horror show are able to unify the audience, validating our shared love of horror” (47119972); “It was a fun time that helped to bring everyone in the audience into a shared experience, which was then reflected while watching the movie” (46829466); and “I feel like Drag Queens add to the fun and fan culture of the horror film. Enriches the fun of the experience and gets the audience in the mood as a whole (they bring the audience together)” (47117167). Drag horror hosts not only heighten the queer connection to horror film, but also solidify the collective experience.

5.2.2 Shared Queer Laughter

Part of the collective experience is found in the shared expression of emotion that unifies Midnight Mass and Queer Horror audiences, as confirmed by my survey data and explicated in prior chapters, which is laughter.<sup>13</sup> In researching the phenomenological responses of audiences, scholar Jessica Hughes points out that analysis should do more than “simply identifying the emotions evoked

---

<sup>13</sup> As noted in Chapter 3, 73.5 percent ( $n = 2,998$ ) of queer horror fans report that horror films make them laugh, with only 8.1 percent ( $n = 332$ ) reporting they do not laugh at horror films. The remaining 18.4 percent either do not have an opinion about laughing at horror films or do not know whether or not they laugh at horror films.

by the films being examined to consider how these emotions connect us to the collective audience of which we are a part” (2016, 43). While laughter can be understood as an expression of a range of emotions, Walter Benjamin calls laughter “the most international and the most revolutionary emotion of the masses” (1999, 224). Laughter can function as a tool of liberation from normative domination because it functions to delegitimize and deflate authority, removing the seriousness and severity of the dominator. Shared laughter is the expressive glue that holds together these temporary live cinema communities, already united in queerness and a love of horror, “thus enabling a collective experience” (Hanich 2014a, 358).<sup>14</sup> As evidenced in Chapter 4, camp is an integral part of the queer spectatorial relationship to horror and laughter is an integral part of camp. This collective experience, moreover, both lives and perpetually changes with the audience (Hanich 2018, 3). The tone of live cinema experiences is accordingly as dependent on the audience as the performance artists and the host. A survey participant states that the drag horror host “created a feeling that the audience was more connected and on a journey together. They also created a space for laughter, something I enjoy while watching horror films” (47802670). This shared laughter is important to a queer shared experience because laughter “draws you closer in a collective bond, strengthening the audience’s we-connection” (Hughes 2016, 51)—a connection forged through shared emotional expression. Narrator Hodges highlights how it is distinctive and political for queer audiences to share laughter and collectively bond over horror: “I think in a lot of ways horror can and has perpetuated stereotypes about queer people and POC people that are extremely damaging. But, at the same time, there’s this other aspect of it that has allowed queer people to come together and laugh at this stuff and examine it and I think that’s really important, too” (2020, 13). In phenomenologically investigating collective expressive reactions, Hanich discusses how the theatre’s “darkness ‘equalizes’ and ‘democratizes’ laughter,” a democratization that results in temporarily

---

<sup>14</sup> Laughter offers queer audiences a connection and release unique to queer people. Hudson recalls: “We did Addams Family Values [on November 16, 2016] and Trump had just been elected. . . . We did a combination of the Wednesday Addams monologue about the first Thanksgiving that she does in Addams Family Values—which is amazing. We combined that with the “Cell Block Tango” from Chicago, and by the end of it we set Trump on fire onscreen, and we all do a Stonewall kick line in front of this image of Trump on fire with an American flag. That went over well. . . . The feedback I was getting from the queers in the audience was that that was the first time they had been able to laugh since the election” (2020c, 12).

enshrouding individual identity markers and thereby creating “laughing collectives [that] can momentarily dissolve social hierarchies and categories” (2018, 212). The laughing collectives of queer live cinema events, such as Midnight Mass and Queer Horror, are not predicated on temporarily masking identity markers but, instead, on heightening the collective queer connection through the cinematic joint action of laughing (and/or screaming).<sup>15</sup> Hudson shares that Queer Horror preshow events are “a way for me to hear laughter from a whole bunch of queers, and to all gather together and to not feel alone and immersed in the horror—the horror of everything that was happening in the American political system at that point” (2020c, 13). This fleeting queer freedom becomes a “carnavalesque action” which “frees the imagination to envision a different world” (Rich 2013, 210), an imagining of new realities such as the dissolution of cisheteronormativity.

5.2.3 Queer Events as the Carnavalesque

Queer live cinema events centered around horror films (as found at Midnight Mass and Queer Horror) embody Mikhail Bakhtin’s carnivalesque mode through both the queer gaiety and the horror films themselves, all of which “seek to create a festive, communal atmosphere in the theater” (Paul 1994, 65; italics in the original). The carnivalesque model is an “instrument of power available to the powerless” that functions as a mode of “sociopolitical intervention” and “political interference” (Rich 2013, 209-210). When queers, a marginalized community, gather to celebrate horror, a marginalized film genre, the celebration becomes inherently political—a politic of exuberant transgressive queer collectivity.<sup>16</sup> Halberstam explains that “queer lives exploit some potential for a difference in form that lies dormant in queer collectivity not as an essential

---

<sup>15</sup> In Laughing Screaming: Modern Hollywood Horror and Comedy, William Paul examines an interface of laughter and fear and states that: “Henri Bergson has written that ‘laughter appears to stand in need of an echo.’ The same is true of screaming. We may scream watching a horror film at home on television or we may let out a real belly laugh watching a comedy, but never as much as in a theater. Horror films and comedies represent preeminently theatrical genres—movies that work best within the context of a crowded theater—because their aesthetic aim is rousing rabble” (Paul 1994, 21).

<sup>16</sup> This study takes as axiomatic the fact that queers gathering together is progressive and celebratory. If Bakhtin argues that the carnivalesque model enables the maintenance of the status quo after or outside of the carnival, I argue that queer gatherings, such as queer live cinema events, offer invaluable emotional and communal outlets that strengthen bonds within the queer community and stand in opposition to cisheteronormativity, both of which are necessary to counter hegemonic society and imagine new social structures and understandings.

attribute of sexual otherness but as a possibility embedded in the break from heterosexual life narratives” (2011, 70; italics in the original). This means, simply, that the act of queers gathering together opens alternative potentialities to cisheteronormative existence. Yet the latent possibilities that these queer carnivals offer may not register with members of the normative majority. Narrator Stodola, a Queer Horror regular, recounts and reflects on the carnivalesque queer space not resonating with cisheterosexuals:

I took one of my straight friends to see The Sentinel, the one with the cat birthday party. It was really funny and the preshow was hilarious and me and Caleb were laughing the whole time. And then we watched the movie. Afterwards, Caleb and I were talking about how good it was, and my friend just goes, ‘I think I was too straight for this’ [laughs]. I was like, ‘Oh!’ And he was like, yeah, ‘I didn’t like the movie. I didn’t understand anything that was going on in the preshow. I just think I’m too straight for this’ (2020, 17).

Midnight Mass and Queer Horror are, fundamentally and consciously, live cinema experiences made by queer people for queer people. While the carnivalesque has been connected to horror and cult film fan practices by previous horror scholars such as Brigid Cherry (1999, 209) and John Lynskey (2020, 33), this intervention specifically considers and extends it to live cinema events at which drag performers are horror hosts for queer audiences. To Bakhtin, the “carnival is more than a mere festivity; it is the oppositional culture of the oppressed, the symbolic, anticipatory overthrow of oppressive social structures” (Stam 1989, 173). In other words, Midnight Mass and Queer Horror create a space for queers to temporarily invert the sociopolitical realities of mainstream culture through a simultaneous celebration of queerness and horror. Moreover, when Bakhtin argues that laughter “lies at the core of a carnivalesque spirit,” he offers the potential of a “radical rethinking of the world” (Moser 2008, 181). Inarguably, laughter permeates these queer live cinema events whereby the collective queer joy offers the audience release from the pressures of insidious trauma caused by pervasive cisheteronormativity, as established in Chapter 4. Midnight Mass existed and Queer Horror exists as lively reclamations of queer space in which both performers and audiences temporarily overturn the dominance of cisheteronormative society in an atmosphere of festive queer community. The inclusive and rebellious queer spaces forged and found at Midnight Mass and Queer Horror also bring together the queer performers on the stage, extending impact beyond the audience. Grannell explains:

The other thing that we did both at Trannyshack<sup>17</sup> and at Midnight Mass is that we continued a legacy of drag culture and drag performance that was inclusive of literally everybody. So if you wanted to play with us, you were invited to play and you could be heterosexual, homosexual, or bisexual. You could be a man, a woman, nonbinary, or trans. These things just didn't matter in this world. And there were no limits to it. You could be young, old, Black, white, whatever. It was all about coming together and putting on a fun show and sharing in something together (2020c, 11-12).

Similar to Grannell's Midnight Mass, Hudson's Queer Horror intentionally showcases an inclusive roster of performers. Hudson explains: "We work with a lot of trans and nonbinary performers. I think they're used to looking at the world in complex ways and I think they're willing to undertake potentially complex things full force and with a lot of humor. And women, too. I love working with female-assigned people on the show because also there are so few avenues for them" (2020d, 5). Correspondingly, Jason Edward Davis, narrator and Queer Horror's resident artist, directly affirms the inclusive audience composition as "a good dynamic of all genders and in-between. There's no majority. So it's people that don't necessarily have those spaces to interact that get to interact" (2020, 25). Queer curators and performers presenting queer performances to inclusive queer audiences is a counter-hegemonic political act simply by being drag art performance from the oppressed for the oppressed. "Carnival celebrated temporary liberation from the prevailing truth and from the established order; it marked the suspension of all hierarchical rank, privileges, norms, and prohibitions" (Bakhtin 1984, 10). During this liminal liberation, Midnight Mass and Queer Horror engender "carnivals of fan participation" for queer horror fans

---

<sup>17</sup> Trannyshack, an inclusive queer performance art and drag show, was founded and hosted by Heklina (Stefan Grygelko) for over 12 years (February 1996 through August 2008) at midnight on Tuesdays at the Stud, a well-known San Francisco queer bar. Starting in 1996, Grannell began developing Peaches Christ on the Trannyshack stage, and "started to find a horror family" there (2020b, 17). The now-legendary show was instrumental to the development of West Coast drag, yet a discussion of Trannyshack should offer historical context about the name due to the culture shifts that have eschewed usage of the term "tranny." Grannell, who no longer uses "the 'T' word" (2020d, 11) explains: "Back then we knew that the word tranny—it wasn't a pejorative at the time, it hadn't become this sort of slur, this hate term—all of our nonbinary- trans-identified friends, even in central Pennsylvania, used the word tranny as an inside term of endearment" (2020b, 15). Grygelko, in 2015, rebranded Trannyshack as Mother to respect the trans* community.

(Fiske 1992a, 41), which is rarely found.

Queers seldom experience and share queer space outside of bars, queer centers, or annual parades; furthermore, these public queer spaces are already under threat of disappearing or closing for multiple reasons, despite existing for a short time or never existing for some areas or communities.<sup>18</sup> Narrator Davis details the importance of queer spaces and the impact for queers not to have them:

When you're not exposed to any gay places or gay people—I didn't know any gay people—it was never a part of my life. It was very isolating. Eventually that turns into self-loathing and you carry that with you for a very long time. I feel like I've been able to build a life that is surrounded with everything I need. But that's hard work and having to choose things: I choose queer. I choose queer spaces. I choose to make art that is not straight (2020, 16).

Here, Davis, as a Queer Horror collaborator, directly speaks to the intentionality to create queer space and have a queer lens in his life, art, and work. A survey participant's comment concurrently emphasizes the importance of queer spaces and the lack thereof: "As a young queer person [seeing a queered horror screening] was one of the first times that I'd seen outwardly queer people in a public space" (47074469). The queer spaces of Midnight Mass and Queer Horror are created in temporary commune between performers and audiences, all of whom are gathered around and absorbed in a shared love of horror films. This engagement for all in attendance is the active embodiment of the carnival, not a passive presentation. "While carnival lasts, there is no other life outside it. During carnival time life is subject only to its laws, that is, the laws of its own freedom" (Bakhtin 1984, 7). The queer freedom of these live cinema events "exist[s] as a challenge to the dominant culture" precisely because of the queer celebrational nature and, as Oliver-Hopkins suggests, reflect "that minority cultures do not require a relationship with hegemonic society to feel complete, which could be seen as more radical still than an attempt to reframe the values of the dominant culture" (2017, 154). Through this, albeit temporary, carnivalesque reprieve, queer spectators have, significantly, engaged in collective action that reaffirms the queer healing power of both camp and horror, even after they exit the theatre to an unchanged world.

---

<sup>18</sup> Queer life and its concomitant spaces have been increasingly altered by cultural, sociopolitical, and technological shifts ranging from marriage equity to social media apps. It would be injudicious to historically romanticize queer spaces since the queer community has often been spatially and temporally fragmented and limited, often due to systemic misogyny and racism. Yet the diminishing number of shared, public queer spaces further fragments and isolates the queer community.

Midnight Mass and Queer Horror create queer “carnival” spaces predicated on celebrating queers and the queer love of horror. Queer subjectivity is continuously discriminated by cisheteronormativity because mainstream culture is not created for queers; therefore, fleeting moments of a queer majority can only exist in temporary communities. A survey participant discussing drag-hosted live cinema horror events emphasizes the need for queer spaces caused by cisheterosexism, explaining that “our communities are largely pushed out of cinema culture so it’s great that there is a movement of bridging the gap and creating our own spaces” (47073933). Atkinson and Kennedy postulate that live cinema events allow for “new forms of embodiment and new possibilities for community engagement and participation” (2018, 20). As such, numerous survey participants’ comments about seeing a drag performer introduce a horror film underscore the importance of both queer space and “bond[ing] the audience as a community” (46829309). Notably, within their temporary communities and as bonded by the drag host, queer audiences are able to collectively claim and connect with the Other in horror in part because queers possess “the inherent understanding of horror as the worship and celebration of ‘otherness’ and the idea of ‘cult’ as community” (46974402). Indeed, Midnight Mass and Queer Horror are cult queer carnivalesque celebrations of both horror and cult films.

5.3 The Cult of Queer Live Cinema

5.3.1 Defining Queer Live Cinema as Cult

This research defines queer live cinema events as cult events, thereby transforming both the films and audiences into cult—regardless of categorization beyond the bounds of the live cinema event experience. This study adopts Mathijs and Mendik’s broad definition of cult film, which they define as “a film with an active and lively communal following” (2008, 11). Queer spectators actively gathering together to form a lively queer audience demonstrates how queer live cinema events not only offer critical queer engagement with the horror genre but also contribute to our understanding of cult. A phenomenological approach to investigating the queer celebration of horror and cult cinema sees the subjectivist process “as a mode of reception, a way of seeing films” (Mathijs and Mendik 2008, 15). At queer live cinema events, both the audience and the films are received as cult, since, as Anne Jerslev asserts, “the cult event transforms the film into a cult film and positions the spectators as a cult audience” (2008, 91). Queer live cinema events, such as Midnight Mass and Queer Horror, phenomenologically alter the reception of horror films, creating a cult around the queer audience’s experience of horror. Following and expanding on Jerslev’s declaration that “cult film is fundamentally an event” (2008, 92), this study emphasizes that the meaning of live cinema events is determined by not only the audience’s shared reaction to the filmic text, but also the preshow’s contextualizing liveness. Stated differently, Midnight Mass and Queer Horror are events that screen and celebrate horror and cult films to queer audiences, thereby also making the event and the audience itself cult. Furthermore, while not all cult films are horror, many horror films are “counted as cult” (Mathijs and Mendik 2008, 20). “Cult films are not made (as, for example, a producer sets out to make a musical or Western) as much as they happen or become,” Bruce A. Austin points out (1989, 83). “It is the audience that turns a film into a cult film” (Austin 1989, 83). A cult film is dependent on an event that is centered on participatory reception by an energized audience. Progressing Austin’s point, if an audience “makes” a cult film, a horror film is made cult by queer drag horror hosts, performers, and audiences at live cinema events. Relatedly, Alexander Doty has argued, by expanding Barthesian semiotics, that a queer reader makes queer any text (1993). Hence, these hosts, performers, and audiences being queer thereby render queer the live cinema events.

The overlap between cult audiences and films and the horror genre directly resonates with queers and the queer experience due to their common social element: being othered. As a survey participant states: “Queers are outsiders, and so is horror and its fans. They’re a perfect marriage” (47717803). Affirming this point, Jessica Hughes discusses how cult cinema possesses “qualities marking it as ‘other’” and cult cinema becomes cult as it is defined by the audience, which is also Other in the case of horror-loving queers (2016, 38). Queers, ontologically and phenomenologically, connect to the othered status of both cult and horror films. “In cult movies viewers laugh at the normal, tame the Other, but nowhere see themselves,” Barry K. Grant argues, surmising that “perhaps this is why cult audiences tend to be composed of teenagers, disenfranchised youths who are caught between childhood and adulthood, who have little sense of belonging” (2008b, 87). Furthering this notion, my mixed-method data indicates that queer audiences develop their identity as adults in part by embracing the Other in horror film and by finding joy in what is rejected by cisheteronormative society, in what can be made a cult film. Hudson emphasizes this point: “There’s just something about that energy of creating a site where we can all get together and all watch a movie, and all see everything that that movie was never celebrated for, but that we celebrate it for, all come to a head in one space, in one night” (2020c, 15). When queers embrace and reclaim a film that was rejected by the mainstream, an emotional connection is forged. As Matt Hills explains “cult fandom is a project of the self which is primarily and significantly emotional” (2008, 134). In fact, “cult fans create cultural identities out of the significance which certain texts assume for them” (Hills 2008, 134; italics in the original). A queer spectator’s own identity then creates significance out of both cult and/or horror texts.<sup>19</sup>

5.3.2 Queer Failure Informs Cult Status

Cult films become “cult” as a result of active audience reassessment, engagement, and ultimately, reanimation of a mainstream filmic failure. Queers connect with a film’s inability to resonate with its intended audience, distinctively understanding and embracing the film’s failure to be understood and embraced, “enjoy[ing] these stupid silly movies or movies that are dismissed as stupid and silly” (Hudson 2020c, 13). The entire realm of cult cinema exists at an incongruous juncture of failure and engagement.<sup>20</sup> Those films that failed because of a decidedly campy perspective will directly connect with queer audiences and be “reanimated” as successful representations of the queer experience.<sup>21</sup> The “cult of Midnight Movies appealed primarily to feelings of awkwardness and alienation, to people who themselves felt ‘different’ or anathematized—teens, gays, college kids” (Chute 1983, 13). In other words, teens, young adults, and queers comprise the audiences that turn a mainstream failure film into a cult success. Notably, this cult audience make-up carries a key distinction between its constituents: age-based demographics versus an identity demographic. While teens and college kids change their demographic over time by growing older, queer identity is neither temporary nor age dependent; instead, queerness exists as a constant identity outside of mainstream society. Young moviegoers likely age into becoming productive heteronormative adults, yet queers always remain othered; a queer person’s very existence is anathema to cisheteronormative (re)productivity and success. Unsurprisingly, then, many queers feel a kinship with failure (a meta failure itself that entirely represents the queer experience), the kinship often transforming into proactive engagement with and affinity towards “failed” films.

---

<sup>19</sup> Mark Jancovich states that “out” queer filmmaker John Waters and the outwardly queer Rocky Horror “were amongst the most prominent examples of the cult movie within the 1970s” (2008, 159).

<sup>20</sup> Narrator Stacie Ponder connects the failures of hegemonic cisheteronormative culture with queer reception, stating: “Whether it’s deliberate camp or unintentional camp, there’s a prism of regular, old homogenous straight white life and it’s like we’re seeing that life refracted—whether we’re causing it to be or we just delight in a misfire” (2020, 29).

In The Queer Art of Failure, Halberstam envisages queer failure, stating that “failing is something queers do and have always done exceptionally well; for queers failure can be a style, to cite Quentin Crisp, or a way of life, to cite Foucault, and it can stand in contrast to the grim scenarios of success that depend upon ‘trying and trying again’” (2011, 3). Importantly, queer failure must not be mistaken for queer incompetence. Queer failure is the successful and purposeful rejection of the cisheteronormative paradigm, which always already fails the queer. The epitome of queer is to embrace and flaunt your failure to be normative. An example that perfectly illustrates this point is Peaches Christ’s official sidekick, Martiny Downsize, “the most flawed and tragic drag queen in all of San Francisco” (Cotter 2017, 113). Martiny became a beloved part of the Midnight Mass preshows precisely because of her failings in drag ambition, wardrobe, and performance. Martiny’s failure to be a “good” drag queen as Peaches Christ’s flawed sidesick led Peaches to coin the expression “flawed is the new fierce” and feature it on Midnight Mass merchandise (see figure 5.3). Wearing the failure of normative and even queer ideals as a badge of pride is an act of queer liberation and strength. Narrator Davis succinctly concludes why many queers identify with failure, stating that “we’re always pretending, we’re always performing, and we’re always failing” (2020, 32). A key part of self-acceptance for queer people is finding a way to the joyful and celebratory political dimension within the queer reclamation of failure. This reappropriation “recognize[s] failure as a way of refusing to acquiesce to dominant logics of power and discipline and as a form of critique” (Halberstam 2011, 88).

---

<sup>21</sup> Queer audiences have famously transformed three previously deemed disastrous films into the Hollywood camp trilogy: Valley of the Dolls (1967), Mommie Dearest (1981), and Showgirls (1995).

If queer failure functions to counter cisheteronormative hegemony, then queer reclamation of the horror genre or failed mainstream films functions to counter hegemonic cisheteronormative fandom. That purposeful perspective and intention of the drag horror host (or performance artist) can reach and be understood by the audience, as alluded by narrator Stodola who describes the queer failure and temporality of the Queer Horror preshow as “that mix between barely rehearsed chaos with very cutting commentary on things that are happening locally and on a grander political scale” (2020, 20). Whilst the

FIGURE 5.3. Author’s Martiny “Flawed is the New Fierce!” t-shirt from Midnight Mass. Graphic design by Chris Hatfield. Image courtesy of Peaches Christ Productions.

Midnight Mass and Queer Horror preshow are led by skilled drag horror hosts who are intelligent, talented, quick-witted, and incredibly knowledgeable about film and the horror genre, the preshow rely on and are made special by the untamed reciprocal queer energy from and between the performers and audiences. Instead of creating a seamless, “perfect” facade, hosts such as Peaches Christ and Carla Rossi embrace spontaneity and fluidity in their preshows, since “professionalism” and “perfectionism” function as white cisheteronormative tools for limiting advancement and reward. The preshows of these live cinema events challenge normative notions of art and performance, creating a distinctively queer engagement with live cinema, and in turn with the horror and cult films themselves.

5.3.3 Connecting the Queer, Cult, and Horror through Rocky Horror

The extensive historical overlap between horror and cult films can be traced to a horror musical and the most prominent cult film of all time: The Rocky Horror Picture Show (1975), “an outrageous tongue-in-cheek tribute to the cult spectrum of late night picture shows—a trashy brew of B movie, schlock sci-fi, and junky horror productions” (Ross 2008, 59). The initial 1975 release of Rocky Horror was deemed a “disaster” by 20th Century Fox and “subsequently distributed poorly and promoted unenthusiastically” (Austin 1989, 84). However, a young gay audience at the Waverly, a theatre in the heart of Greenwich Village,<sup>22</sup> resurrected Rocky Horror on April Fool’s Day in 1976. By Halloween 1977, the cult phenomenon had taken hold through avenues that included increasingly ritualized audience participation (such as dancing, throwing objects, and call backs), and quickly spread to other theatres and cities (see Henkin 1979 and Piro 1990).<sup>23</sup> Certainly, Rocky Horror, “the best-known cult film” (Austin 1989, 84), would not have received renewed life without the queer audience who saw themselves in the commercially and critically failed text.

Rocky Horror has had extensive cultural influence, including on horror hosts such as Peaches Christ and the live cinema events that celebrate horror cinema. Rocky Horror also impacted audiences and their collective engagement, specifically queer audience engagement. As John Lynskey

---

<sup>22</sup> Greenwich Village is Manhattan’s “gay haven” neighborhood (Gordon 2019, 37) and home to the Stonewall riots that shaped the gay liberation movement.

<sup>23</sup> To date, numerous theatres across the world continue to screen Rocky Horror, including long-running midnight screenings at Milwaukee, Wisconsin’s Oriental Theatre and Portland, Oregon’s Clinton Street Theater since 1978. While the current global pandemic has interrupted these regular theatre-going activities, the Clinton Street Theater played Rocky Horror for 54 Saturdays in a row to an empty house in order to maintain the theatre’s 43-year screening streak. The fate of countless other regular midnight Rocky Horror screenings and their resurrection remains to be determined.

explains, “Rocky Horror screenings began to develop as alternative, radical spaces that promoted participation, allowing for an open demonstration of queer identity in response to conditioned, mainstream cinema practices of passive cinema viewing” (2020, 32). Rocky Horror enabled queer audiences collectively to embody their fandom in ways previously unknown. Narrator Mark Estes shares that “Rocky Horror was the most recognizable way for queers to get together and just enjoy something on screen that celebrated us and our love for the macabre and the strange and unusual” (2020, 30). Midnight Mass and Queer Horror are live cinema events that feature not only film exhibition but also an “embodied live experience” (Atkinson and Kennedy 2018, ix) that reaches “beyond [cinema’s] typical boundaries” (Klinger 2018, xvii). In fact, these queer live cinema events form a cult community built around the celebration of films from the fringe, as established by Rocky Horror. Moreover, as Mathijs and Mendik point out, “what all cult film consumptions have in common is that they are ‘lived’ experiences” (Mathijs and Mendik 2008, 4). Mathijs and Mendik further observe, in discussing film festivals, that queer audiences “play a unique role in the reading and reception of cult cinema” (2008, 376). Cult and horror film reading and reception that is led by drag hosts underscores a transgressive queerness that exists at the margins of society. As a survey participant writes, “cult horror goes hand in hand with the camp art of drag” (46877531). Cult films and the horror genre exist outside the cinematic mainstream, yet in queer live cinema events they are embraced and extolled by drag artists and queer audiences. Cult cinema exists through the queer community’s salvation of failed, misunderstood films, and numerous mainstream commercial and/or critical film failures have found themselves reanimated through queer subversiveness, productivity, and artistry.<sup>24</sup>

5.3.4 Foundations of Queer Horror Performance in San Francisco

Examples of queer subversiveness, productivity, and artistry exist across latter twentieth- and early twenty-first-century history, with a number providing a foundation for today’s key representations of queer live cinema. While a

---

<sup>24</sup> Some of the best-known mainstream horror “flops” that have been reanimated as cult and/or horror successes by queer audiences are: The Rocky Horror Picture Show (1975), Death Becomes Her (1992), Hocus Pocus (1993), and Jennifer’s Body (2009). As a survey participant writes: “We [queers] will find movies that have tanked or that had a bad rap with the mainstream horror community and we make stars out of them” (47790815).

complete examination of queer contributions to live cinema lie outside the parameters of this study, the history of San Francisco's The Cockettes and The Sick & Twisted Players serve as key examples of the queerly distinctive and distinctly queer relationship to horror film. Since the horror genre historically has rendered the queer subtextual, queer performers and audiences have found and revealed their queer connection to horror film, setting the stage for generations of queer artists.<sup>25</sup> The Cockettes and The Sick & Twisted Players are two such queer performance troupes that incorporated horror film, both informing the San Francisco drag culture and impacting queer culture beyond their historic temporal and spatial bounds. The Cockettes were a San Francisco theatrical drag review, a group of performers including nonnormative sexualities and genders,<sup>26</sup> that created performances and presented midnight movies at the Pagoda Palace from 1969 through 1971, reaching a level of international notoriety due to their raucous queer shows. In 1970, the troupe staged the Halloween Horror Spectacular, featuring The Cockettes "on stage in Les Ghouls plus on the screen Night of the Living Dead" (Hauser 2020, 230). The Halloween Horror Spectacular also included a midnight horror movie marathon screening of Masque of the Red Death (1964), Bluebeard (1944), and The Cat and the Canary (1927) (Hauser 2020, 207). Peaches Christ had "the benefit of being part of the legacy of The Cockettes," so there was never a need for Grannell to "redefine a drag culture" that would be rooted in horror and inclusive of all genders and sexualities (2020d, 14).<sup>27</sup> Grannell, when pitching the idea of the now legendary film event series Midnight Mass, to Landmark Theatres in 1998, "begged and pleaded and explained the history of The Cockettes as a reason to allow [him] to do this" (2020c, 3). The legacy of The Cockettes also directly impacted Hudson, an Oregonian growing up in the 1990s, who explains: "The Cockettes were really inspiring to the early Tampon Troupe [Hudson's early drag troupe]. We would watch The Cockettes and the Leigh Bowery

---

<sup>25</sup> As indicated prior, explicating the history of queer representation in horror film is beyond the scope of this study. Numerous scholars have documented horror film's textual and subtextual queer representation. See the work of Harry Benshoff, David J. Skal, Andrew Scahill, and Darren Elliott-Smith.

<sup>26</sup> Perhaps the most well-known member of The Cockettes was singer-songwriter Sylvester who co-wrote and recorded the 1978 hit disco single "You Make Me Feel (Mighty Real)," which was selected by the Library of Congress for preservation in the National Recording Registry in 2019.

<sup>27</sup> This is noteworthy because the popular image of the drag queen has been "dominated primarily by cis gay men," partially due to the international success of RuPaul's Drag Race, as noted by Katie Horowitz in Drag, Interperformance, and the Trouble with Queerness (2020, 2).

documentaries on loop” (2020c, 17). The queer live cinema legacy begun by The Cockettes was carried and furthered three decades later by The Sick & Twisted Players, who, inspired by horror films, created live theatre events in San Francisco, starting in 1990. The Sick & Twisted Players were a queer theatre troupe that became an underground phenomenon by recreating horror film scenes at the floating cabaret Klubstitute. They then began performing full-length horror films, creating 35 productions that included The Shining. . . The Musical, The Exorcist: A Dance Macabre, and a live stage production of Carrie. The troupe founder Tony Vaguely also “pioneered the theatrical mash-up,” writing live theatre events that combined horror films with other films and shows, such as A Very Brady Friday the 13th; Texas Chainsaw 90210; Alien: Starring Josie and the Pussycats in Outer Space; A Facts of Life Prom Night; and The Fog: Starring Gilligan’s Island (Orloff 2019, 183-184). The Sick & Twisted Players also incorporated famous special guests, a precursor to Grannell’s Idol Worship—in-person interviews with famous guests as part of the Midnight Mass live show.<sup>28</sup> In 1996, The Sick & Twisted Players held a live cinema event called the Linda Blair Affair, a queer Pride event for which the audience was encouraged to “dress possessed” for entering The Exorcist look-a-like contest. The performance included live “interpretations” and “selective spoofs” of actor Linda Blair’s horror classics, such as The Exorcist, The Exorcist II, and Hell Night (Van Iquity 1996, 41). The Sick & Twisted Players’ shows not only “acted as agitprop for an enlightened gender sensibility” (Orloff 2019, 186), but also further primed queer audiences in San Francisco and beyond for a queer live horror cinema entertainment.

5.4 Drag as Queer Performance

Drag has long existed as an art form at the margins of the queer community, even as RuPaul’s Drag Race may have permanently changed the perception of the art of drag, bringing it mainstream exposure and new legions of cisheterosexual fans.<sup>29</sup> C. Winter Han states that, “there is a long history of

---

<sup>28</sup> This segment of Midnight Mass was host to John Waters, Cassandra Peterson (Elvira), RuPaul Charles, Mink Stole, Tura Satana, Mary Woronov, Stephen Geoffreys, Erica Gavin, and Patrick Bristow.

<sup>29</sup> Presenting the entire history of drag is outside of scope of this study. While a single book is incapable of encapsulating all the myriad facets of drag and gender performance, see Drag: The Complete Story by Simon Doonan for an overview of different “types” of drag including glamour, various gay organizations actively attempting to exclude drag queens from participating in gay pride events and gay social settings by arguing that drag queens fail to meet respectable community standards” (2015, 146). In the fight for human rights, many gay and lesbian organizations chose messaging and arguments that would convince heterosexuals that queer people are “just like them,” and, therefore, deserving of equal rights. Their goal was to normalize cisheterosexual perceptions of gay, lesbian and bisexual people. However, some trans* members of the community, gender nonconforming individuals, and/or drag performers complicated this normalization tactic due to their nonnormative gender expression. Since “trans* bodies represent the art of becoming, the necessity of imagining, and the fleshly insistence of transitivity” (Halberstam 2018, 136), these individuals were marginalized within the gay and lesbian community and left out of those advances. Grannell reflects on the perception and treatment of drag performers within the community:

I think within the gay community we [as queer drag artists] were still outsiders. Trannyshack and Midnight Mass flew in the face of ‘sweater gays’ and ‘corporate gays’ and the HRC [Human Rights Campaign]. They would hate to acknowledge this, but there was a big part of the gay rights movement—the marriage equality movement—that did not want us anywhere near them. In fact, they really wanted us to just be pushed to the side. And so I think what we were creating was essentially—as you said—a queer space that was inclusive of every freak, every weirdo, every deviant (2020c, 11).

In fact, throughout the 1960s and 1970s, drag performers were “a source of contestation among gay activists” (Hillman 2011, 154-156) because the “extreme” nonnormativity of drag queens was seen as a inhibitor to rights and acceptance. Even today, drag horror performers (sometimes referred to as “horror queens” or “scream queens”) exist at the margin of the already marginalized art of drag (evidenced in part by the difference in mainstream popularity between RuPaul’s Drag Race and The Boulet Brothers’ Dragula).<sup>30</sup> art, butch, Black, historical, comedy, popstar, movie, and radical drag. This study does not offer a comprehensive theorization of the gender politics of drag, nor does it engage with the limiting belief that drag is inherently misogynistic. Drag is a vast art form that encompasses much more than men performing femininity; as Meredith Heller states, the “popular public knowledge about drag is narrow and premised on (and, I argue, bounded and limited by) a myopic vision of the genre” (2020, 1). However, since misogyny is a rampant socially constructed and perpetuated phenomenon, I acknowledge that some drag may be problematic (such as that which is misogynistic or racist) and that drag is not a universally-accepted queer art form.

---

<sup>30</sup> Narrator Michael Varrati further connects drag and horror, explaining: “I’ve always said that there’s a strong connection between drag queens and horror because both are art forms that

Speaking directly to the “horrific” nature of drag and, thus, the shared transgressiveness between drag and horror, Grannell explains:

If you’re looking at drag from the point of view of some white redneck who’s been raised to believe that queerness is scary, then all drag has horror embedded in it. Whether you’re a Liza Minnelli impersonator or Peaches Christ. Okay. So, taking that out of the equation, that all drag is transgressive—which it is—any drag could be scary depending on who’s viewing it. But I would say that, in general, in the larger drag world, that horror has not been part of people’s attraction to drag. However, I think because of queerness being such a big part of why some of us are attracted to horror and why some of us are attracted to drag, that there is this way that they’ve been merged for a bunch of us (2020d, 12).

Describing drag performances can be difficult, as Richard Niles explains “because of the unique collaboration between audience and performer and the elusive factors of ‘camp’ and ‘gay sensibility’” (2004, 41). Nonetheless, survey participant and narrator responses indicate that drag performances enhance the significance of live cinema events. A drag performer introducing a horror film carries meaning beyond simply the representation of a campy queer performance art onstage. Drag and horror share that transgressive core; as another survey participant emphasizes, “drag is subversive and so is horror, I think they can go hand in hand” (47082634). Furthermore, drag horror hosts enhance the experience of horror exhibition, altering the reception experience of the horror film.<sup>31</sup> A survey participant discusses drag horror hosts bringing “a campy, gay, smart take on horror films to a queer audience, which made me enjoy the films more” (46764770).

Drag is an art form that (re)interprets and (re)presents. In the groundbreaking ethnographic study Mother Camp: Female Impersonators in America, Esther Newton examines drag as the art form in which “appearance is an illusion” (Newton 1979, 103). Newton’s early elucidation of gender as a take heightened reality and force you to look at things that maybe you could otherwise ignore. It’s why drag queens have always been on the front lines of every great queer movement. Because if you and I are marching in front of a bar in front of a building, on down the street with a sign, if someone chooses to look the other way, they can. And they do sometimes. But a drag queen, in that opulent, gigantic outfit, they’re harder to ignore. You can’t ignore something that is so in your face and so ultra. So by using the outrageous to make you look, they can then kick in a door in the same way that horror does. It’s like you may be looking at the monster, but then you discover, ‘Oh, this is about the atomic weapon’” (2020, 24).

---

<sup>31</sup> Narrator Estes suggests how special effects makeup and costuming can offer another connection between drag and horror: “Drag has always been there in horror but people don’t want to call it drag, they want to call it this demon, this creature” (2020, 29).

socially-constructed performative act stands as an ideological influence on gender studies (1979, 5). This influence extends to the work of Judith Butler (1990), whose argument demonstrates “drag as a practice divulges a series of discordant elements that ultimately undermine both the assumption of heterosexual coherence and the idea that heterosexuality is original” (Lloyd 2007, 43; italics in the original). In other words, heterosexuality relies on the essentialist “natural” construction of the gender binary; the gender dissonance of drag can function to disrupt, subvert, and denaturalize heteronormativity by revealing “all gender as parody” (Lloyd 2007, 44; italics in the original). Regardless of the performer’s intention, drag “camps” the socially constructed nature and performativity of gender. A drag performance’s gender (dis)illusion fundamentally transgresses and politically resists binaristic gender construction.<sup>32</sup> When that drag commentary, artistry, and performance introduces horror films to audiences composed of nonnormative genders and sexualities, it serves as a bridge between embodied queer experiences and the filmic representation of the trauma they endure. This queer horror connection is evidenced by numerous survey participants:

I love going to see horror films in a theater and having some sort of program introduce it, it’s especially affirming when they are drag queens. I feel at home in my own monstrosity when this happens. And while I don’t think all drag queens would consider themselves to be monsters, drag is a political framework that understands, embraces and affirms our ‘otherness’ (46926354).

I love drag queens (and kings) because they highlight the performative nature of gender and identity and their performance of camp engages with the idea of the horrific uncanny (47076895).

The theatrics of the drag show compliment the heightened energy of most horror. The queerness also compliments the often overlooked and disrespected genre (47603598).

I felt a shift in target audience. No longer was the target white, cis men, there was a sense of a larger queering of interpretation and acknowledgment of significance to a queer audience/community (46919087).

Drag as an art form sort of captures the same anti-establishment, weirdo, politically incorrect, rebel mentality that all the best horror films do (46824603).

---

<sup>32</sup> In agreement with Dolores McElroy, this study maintains that “at its core, camp acknowledges that ‘masculine’ and ‘feminine’ are merely poses and not rooted in biology or essence” (2016, 303).

She [the drag queen] always engages with the queer undertones presented in the film and works through the problematics but also the potential empowerment by reading horror as queer to work through the demonization of queer identities (47593223).

5.5 Drag Performers as Queer Live Cinema's Horror Hosts

This study now will establish that drag performers hold an important community role by being horror hosts for queer live cinema events. Understanding the history of horror hosts and the importance of the role of horror host being held by a queer drag artist is essential to properly situate queer live cinema events, as will be evidenced by forthcoming explications of Midnight Mass and Queer Horror. The long history of horror hosts includes over-the-top personalities, the essence of camp, heightened by makeup and costuming, a drag aesthetic.

Campy drag personas are integral to two of the most iconic horror hosts:

Vampira, the earliest horror host, and Elvira, a queer horror icon who is indebted to Vampira and became “the most famous horror host of all time” (Watson 1991, 162). This drag element and the “campy flair of Elvira and other movie hosts” (47117296) has a particular resonance for queer horror fans, taking on a pointedly queer and, therefore, political dimension. Horror, furthermore, is the only genre with a long history of being presented to audiences by theatrical hosts, commonly on the television screen.<sup>33</sup> The majority, 59.4 percent ( $n = 2,437$ ), of queer horror fans have watched, on television or streaming, a horror host (such as Elvira, Mistress of the Dark or Joe Bob Briggs) introduce a horror film. Horror hosts reached a cultural zenith in US culture during the 1980s with the international popularity of Elvira, Mistress of the Dark. To this point, a statistical test reveals a correlation between the age of survey participants and reporting having seen a horror host, with those raised during the pinnacle of televised horror hosts most likely to have seen one. A medium effect negative correlation exists between the survey participants who have watched a horror host and age ( $r_s = -.37, p \leq .000$ ). The youngest participants (18-23 years old) were least likely to have seen a horror host, with 36 percent having seen a horror host; whereas, 100 percent of participants 60-65 years old have seen a horror host.<sup>34</sup> Furthermore, survey participants from the US (66.8 percent) are more likely to have seen a horror host compared with those from the UK, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand (46.7 percent) or elsewhere in the world (33.6 percent), indicating a cultural dimension to this viewership. Regardless of age or nationality, a large percent of the entire horror-loving queer community has seen a horror host. As such, a queer live cinema event “fosters cultural appreciation for camp horror queens, such as Elvira and Peaches Christ” (46967128). Another participant extols, “I enjoyed the camp of hosts like Vampira and Elvira growing up and the drag introductions both hearken back to that and add a queer(er) dimension which I enjoy” (47434988).

---

<sup>33</sup> The history of televised horror hosts dates back to 1954 with the debut of The Vampira Show, fronted by Vampira, a character created by Maila Nurmi. While the popularity and proliferation of TV horror hosts since then is concentrated in localized US markets, there were numerous international horror hosts, including Deadly Earnest (Australia) and Mistress Olga (Canada). Elvira, Mistress of the Dark became—and continues to be—an international pop icon based on her horror hostess debut in Movie Macabre (1981 to 1986). Today, numerous horror hosts across the globe have moved from televised hosting to presenting in streaming shows online, allowing them to reach a new generation of horror fans (and horror fans in the making). For more detailed information about the robust history of television's horror hosts see: Television Horror Movie Hosts: 68 Vampires, Mad Scientists and Other Denizens of the Late-night Airwaves Examined and Interviewed (1991) by Elena M. Watson and Vampira and Her Daughters: Women Horror Movie Hosts from the 1950s into the Internet Era (2017) by Robert Michael “Bobb” Cotter.

FIGURE 5.4. Carla Rossi dressed in homage to Elvira during the preshow for Elvira: Mistress of the Dark (1988) on October 31, 2019. Photo by Josh Lunden. Image courtesy of Anthony Hudson.

<sup>34</sup> The age breakdown of survey participants who have watched, on television or streaming, a horror host (such as Elvira, Mistress of the Dark or Joe Bob Briggs) introduce a horror film are as follows: 36 percent of those who are 18-23 years old; 51.5 percent of those who are 24-29 years old; 70.6 percent of those who are 30-35 years old; 84.5 percent of those who are 36-41 years old; 88.8 percent of those who are 42-47 years old; 80.9 percent of those who are 48-53 years old; 87.5 percent of those who are 54-59 years old; 100 percent of those who are 60-65 years old; and 66.7 percent of those who are 66+ years old.

Televised horror hosts nurtured and grew generations of horror fans, whereas the drag horror hosts who helm live cinema events today nourish the queer community's connection to horror, setting the stage for critical queer horror audience engagement. Peaches Christ and Carla Rossi, along with other drag performers who introduce horror film to queer audiences, establish an embodied queer connection between horror fandom and horror film. A queer ceremonial leader, or campy carnivalesque guide, functions to reinforce the queer connection to horror. Performance artists such as Peaches Christ and Carla Rossi represent as more than drag queens to their audiences, manifesting as drag horror hosts. One participant reflects on watching Peaches Christ in a show, stating, "I just LOVE horror hosts and was watching her as a horror host character like Elvira or Count Gore" (47099527). Even though some survey participants recognize that "there's a lineage of inspiration between drag and horror" (47244225), this lineage is not manifested often through queer embodiment of the horror genre. This scarcity of representation is highlighted by a survey participant who notes that "horror isn't often linked with queer performance so it's exciting to see it done" (47244225). The drag horror hosts themselves also identify their introduction to drag as stemming from horror, as Grannell notes when he explains that he "was introduced to drag through Frank N. Furter and Divine, and, inherently, both those performers and performances are horror. They come from the world of horror. . . So, for me personally, drag has always included horror" (2020d, 12).<sup>35</sup> The historical legacy and cultural influence of horror hosts is evident in Grannell's creation of Peaches Christ.

5.6 Midnight Mass with your Hostess Peaches Christ

Grannell created his horror host identity, drag persona Peaches Christ, after he landed in San Francisco in 1996 and entered a queer and drag cultural landscape that largely was shaped by the International Imperial Court System, the Cockettes, the Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence, the Sick & Twisted Players, and Trannyshack. Grannell's inspiration to move west came when he, as a

---

<sup>35</sup> Grannell further explains the transgressiveness imbued in his drag due to the traumas he sustained from growing up in a cisheteronormative society: "Peaches Christ had to be born in the underground. She had to be nurtured through adversity. I don't think I would have become successful if it wasn't for those sorts of challenges and flying in the face of the establishment—and the establishment at the time could have been anything—it was anything that wasn't us" (2020c, 8).

Pennsylvania State University film student, was part of a committee with Michael Brenchley that brought John Waters to Penn State.<sup>36</sup> Waters told Grannell about San Francisco's flourishing queer and underground film scenes; shortly after, Grannell (and Brenchley) decided to move to San Francisco. Grannell recalls:

I barely heard about The Cockettes and John told us about how they used to do shows at movie theatres at midnight—'cause this is before the documentary. And he told us about the Kuchar Brothers. So I looked up the Kuchar Brothers. And he told us about Canyon Cinema and how San Francisco was really a great place for underground filmmakers. And that's literally all I needed to hear. Like that was it. That was all I needed to hear (2020b, 13-14).

FIGURE 5.5. Promotional material for Midnight Mass. Graphic design by Chris Hatfield. Image courtesy of Peaches Christ Productions.

Soon after moving, Grannell, who “wanted to be John Waters meets Wes

---

<sup>36</sup> Brenchley and Grannell became friends during college, before the creation of their drag identities Martiny and Peaches Christ. “Michael was the leader of the student organization, the LGBSA, and he was the Entertainment Director and I was one of the leaders of the student filmmaker organization. So, in our senior year, we kind of pooled resources and put a budget together to bring John Waters to Penn State for a weekend to do a talk during Pride week. John would do his one-man sort of lecture. Selfishly, what that meant was Michael and I got to pick John up from the little tiny airport, and we got to make sure he got from his hotel to the venue, and we also got to take him out to dinner and meet him” (Grannell 2020b, 13).

Craven” (2020b, 17), was managing the Bridge Theatre, a local single-screen arthouse theatre, and created Peaches Christ—both of which culminated in his creation of Midnight Mass. Grannell elucidates the concept behind Midnight Mass: “My idea was that I wanted to create an experience that wasn’t necessarily either a drag show or a midnight movie screening but both combined. It was my love for Trannyshack and my love for midnight movies mashed up into one experience on Saturday nights at midnight at the Bridge Theatre” (2020c, 3).

Grannell synthesized the influences of The Cockettes and Rocky Horror into horror hosting and queer performance alongside sustained horror film exhibition,<sup>37</sup> creating Midnight Mass as a summer series from June 1998 until late 2009 at the Bridge Theatre, 3010 Geary Boulevard, San Francisco, California.<sup>38</sup> The Bridge, named after the Golden Gate Bridge (construction of which was completed in 1937), was a 360-seat single-screen theatre that opened in 1939.<sup>39</sup> Grannell, as a movie theatre manager in the 1990s, understood that the future of cinema would be event-led.<sup>40</sup> For over ten years, Grannell’s Midnight Mass provided a queer cinematic space, exhibiting horror films such as The Bad Seed (1956), Homicidal (1961), Spider Baby (1967), Carrie (1976), The Evil Dead (1981), Sleepaway Camp (1983), and Dead Alive (1992), all combined with immersive 30-minute long drag

---

<sup>37</sup> Even though Grannell never attended a Cockettes or Sick & Twisted play, the legacy of those shows informed both the San Francisco drag culture, of which Grannell became a vital part, and the creation of his midnight movie series. Similarly, Hudson never attended a Cockettes, Sick & Twisted, or Midnight Mass event; yet the San Francisco drag culture made an impact on Portland, Oregon years later.

<sup>38</sup> Midnight Mass existed as an occasional or international live cinema event hosted in various locations after it stopped production at the Bridge Theatre in 2009. Grannell explains: “But, in many ways, Midnight Mass ended when we left the Bridge. And it’s why I stopped calling it Midnight Mass, because I wanted to protect the legacy of those years because they were really special. What we do now is definitely born out of Midnight Mass, but it’s not Midnight Mass” (2020c, 16).

<sup>39</sup> The Bridge Theatre permanently closed its doors on December 27, 2012, becoming the San Francisco Baseball Academy. This closure underscores the temporary nature of the Bakhtinian carnival whilst simultaneously highlighting the tech-led gentrification and un-queering of San Francisco itself. Since queer spaces can exist only in the present moment, the ghosts of (temporary) queer spaces permeate and haunt the cisheteronormative landscape.

<sup>40</sup> Grannell explains: “It was me saying that event-based cinema was the future and that we were ahead of our time and I was right. At that time, event-based cinema was not the thing it is today. Today, Paul Reubens is going on tour with an anniversary celebration of Pee-wee’s Big Adventure. That kind of event—seeing the celebrities, seeing a performance with cinema is now everywhere because it’s how exhibition is competing with streaming online and people who have movie theatres in their homes. So event-based cinema now is definitely a thing. A really big thing. When I was doing it, I was calling it sort of a modern attempt at a William Castle-style screening. William Castle did event-based cinema before anybody else” (2020d, 7).

productions staged before the start of the film.<sup>41</sup> Each Midnight Mass also included events such as drag “mother/daughter” mud wrestling, “Filthiest Person Alive” contests, werewolf-a-lympics, zombie beauty queen pageants, and drag queen roller derby, the last requiring the audience to sign releases due to its raucous nature. The preciousness of this theatre space being made temporarily and enthusiastically queer was further evidenced by the afterparties, in which the rowdiness and energy continued, even as the audience numbers dwindled, often until dawn. Midnight Mass was built around a midnight start time, well after the “normal” movies finished and normative crowds were home. Midnight, a signifier of darkness and of the Other-worldly possibilities that the dark brings, holds special resonance for queers since much of queer history has existed in the shadows of night, sequestered away from the normative productivity of the day. Film critic David Chute highlights that “trotting off to a midnight screening defies conventional viewing habits” (1983, 13) and, as film scholar Jessica Hughes notes, “suggests a welcoming of alternative behaviors” (2016, 49). Certainly, Midnight Mass was an anti-conventional boisterous amalgamation of queer, horror, cult, camp, and drag. With Divine, Frank-N-Furter, and Elvira as his “spiritual drag mothers” (Grannell 2020c, 12), Grannell’s “Midnight Mass made horror the campy spectacle it’s meant to be!” (47124411). Even though the entire Midnight Mass experience was filtered through a horror lens, Grannell sometimes created a shorter all-horror Midnight Mass series in the autumn to build excitement for the “high homo” horror holiday that is Halloween (2020c, 14). “Horror, to this day, has always colored my midnight movie, cult movie career,” Grannell explains, and Midnight Mass was created “under the umbrella or through the lens of horror” (2020c, 9).<sup>42</sup> This queer horror utopia was furthered as a live cinema experience outside of the bounds of the auditorium of <sup>41</sup> The final season of Midnight Mass evidences the prevalence of horror films; this season opened with an in-person tribute to Linda Blair that included screenings of Roller Boogie (1979) and The Exorcist (1973). The rest of the final season included screenings of Heathers (1989), Evil Dead 2: Dead by Dawn (1987), Showgirls (1995), Pink Flamingos (1972), and Poltergeist (1982). The final Midnight Mass screening was, fittingly, Elvira: Mistress of the Dark (1988) featuring an in-person tribute to Elvira.

---

<sup>42</sup> Grannell explains how Midnight Mass framed the experience of cult films such as Showgirls through a horror lens: “Showgirls was our biggest success the entire summer of 1998. I was able to put on screen and onstage something that a handful of people—300 people—understood and we were able to celebrate that film in a way that was horrific. We celebrated the horrors of it in a way that was lovely. Elizabeth Berkley wasn’t a terrible actress to us. She was an aggressive shitkicker who intimidated and terrified normal audiences. But we understood her, we believed in her. So I think there was horror in all of this stuff that we did” (2020c, 9).

the Bridge Theatre with the Russian River Massacre. Peaches Christ, in partnership with Putanesca (José Guzmán Colón) and Vinsantos, conceived of and produced the Russian River Massacre, a queer horror weekend in Guerneville, California, the “Gay Riviera,” approximately 70 miles north of San Francisco. In a forest clearing, with a piece of spandex stretched between two trees as the screen, Peaches Christ hosted Midnight Mass under the stars with the horror films The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) and Sleepaway Camp (1983). The extension of Midnight Mass into the woods demonstrates that queer space is not only transitory but unlocalized—queers can create queer spaces wherever they go.

FIGURE 5.6. “Midnight Mass: Prepare to Experience a New Form of Terror” sweatshirt design. Graphic design by Chris Hatfield. Image courtesy of Peaches Christ Productions.

With horror at its heart, Midnight Mass was the time and place for Grannell to create “a space for the fringe folks to come together under one roof, which was inclusive of all drag performers” (Grannell 2020c, 11). Midnight

Mass<sup>43</sup> celebrated the fringe through its embrace of cult cinema, with horror being integral in the broad cult category. Grannell made that connection clear through his understanding and presentation of cult films that are not usually attributed to the horror genre but have many transgressive horror elements. For example, the films of John Waters include dismemberment, mayhem, and murder, about which Grannell speaks directly: “Female Trouble is not necessarily something people would put in the horror genre, but I would argue that horror is a big part of Female Trouble. Divine having acid thrown on her face and a woman being locked in a birdcage and having her arm cut off and a child being beaten with a car aerial—yes, this is all played for comedy—but it’s also horror” (2020c, 9). This knowledge about and life-long passion for horror informs Grannell’s work as a writer, drag performer, and host. The drag preshows were just as important as the films to the queer audience because Peaches Christ “know[s] a great deal about the film” (47114605) and “her showmanship and gravitas really charged up the audience and let us know it was okay to be loud, and release our tension” (48127872). Peaches Christ, as a drag horror host, crafted campy queer horror experiences that gave audiences full of horror-loving queers a cathartic queer home. Because “camp is the voice of survival and continuity in a community that needs to be reminded that it possesses both” (Bergman 1993, 107), the queer, campy drag connection made by the live drag performance to the presented horror film resonates deeply with and holds life-changing significance for audience members. A Peaches Christ production, whether Midnight Mass or feature-length drag parody plays, offers queers a space to find community, especially young queers. A survey participant who saw Peaches Christ and Sharon Needles in Silence of the Trans emphasizes this importance, noting that show as the “first time I ever saw drag theater and horror all together. I was a high schooler and it rocked my world” (47123315). Queer attendees, then, attach an importance and significance to their queer horror host and performer, noting about Grannell that “Peaches Christ is God” (47406435) and is an “absolute legend” (47093264). Grannell built this influence over a decade through Midnight Mass as a live cinema event that created a queer space in San Francisco and fostered the queer love of horror.<sup>44</sup> For over a decade, Grannell's Midnight Mass altered the history of horror exhibition, informed by its queer liveness and sharedness, and created a queer live cinema experience that has carried meaning beyond the borders of San Francisco and the bounds of time.

---

<sup>43</sup> In 2007, to celebrate the 10th Anniversary of Midnight Mass, HDnet Movie Channel produced a 6-episode reality series called Midnight Mass with Your Hostess Peaches Christ. Also, in 2007, the M. H. de Young Memorial Museum in San Francisco hosted “Cattyism: A Peaches Christ Retrospective.”

FIGURE 5.7. Midnight Mass Season of Horror Calendar. Graphic design by Chris Hatfield. Image courtesy of Peaches Christ Productions.

<sup>44</sup> Grannell (and Peaches Christ) continues to create live horror events that entertain and impact horror-loving queers. In 2010, Grannell released his debut feature film All About Evil (2010), which he took on an international live cinema tour called the "Peaches Christ 4-D Event Experience." Prior to the pandemic, Grannell wrote film parody plays that he toured through Peaches Christ Productions with well-known drag queens and starring Peaches Christ. These parody plays include drag horror titles such as Shettlejuice, Silences of the Trans, What Ever Happened to Bianca Del Rio?, Drag Becomes Her, and Hocum Pokem. Recently, Grannell created Terror Vault, the first immersive haunted attraction created by queers, featuring queer performers, and marketed to queers.

5.7 Welcome to Queer Horror

Queer Horror, which, upon its start in 2015 at the historic Hollywood Theatre (which opened in 1926 at 4122 NE Sandy Boulevard, Portland, Oregon), filled a space in the Portland culture scene and a need for the queer community. An influence for its creation came to Anthony Hudson, a generation younger than Grannell, in part from their knowledge of Midnight Mass, with Grannell as an influence. Hudson, when creating Queer Horror, very consciously pitched it as partially in tribute to Peaches Christ, who was doing something I'd always wanted to do. She was both of the things I'd always really been drawn to, which was horror hostess and drag queen. So that was a huge influence for me in starting Queer Horror. And then the preshow idea, too—I was thinking, 'Oh wait, we can perform before the movie and not just show these short films' (2020c, 17).

Hudson's preshow performance as Carla Rossi<sup>45</sup> are an amalgamation of queer culture, horror references, political commentary, pop culture, and current cultural events references. As Queer Horror grew in popularity, Hudson created increasingly elaborate and sharply political preshows.<sup>46</sup> For example, the preshow for The Stepford Wives (1975), titled "The Portland Wives" opened with Krzysztof Komeda's musical composition "Rosemary's Lullaby" from Rosemary's Baby and text projected on the movie screen that read: "Yes, we know this is from a different Ira Levin adaptation." A few beats later, the screen displayed the word "nerds," an acknowledgement of the intertextual horror knowledge held by the audience, which was met with a burst of laughter. Hudson had simultaneously situated the Queer Horror preshow within the history of the horror genre (both films are Ira Levin adaptations) and knowingly recognized the horror proficiency of the queer audience. The preshow<sup>47</sup>

---

<sup>45</sup> Carlo Rossi is an inexpensive ("cheap") and popular mainstream brand of wine that is often sold in jugs.

<sup>46</sup> Queer Horror has continually sold out since 2016. The Craft (1996) was the first event to sell out in 2016, with nearly every screening selling out since. The event screening Death Becomes Her (1992) in 2017, sold out in two days and, to date, is the only event to have a second screening added.

<sup>47</sup> This preshow also included covert commentary referencing Carla Rossi having been barred from performing at Portland State University due to Hudson's open criticism of PSU's decision to arm campus police officers. Narrator Stodola, aware of this event and aftermath, notes that "Carla was very vocal about PSU's decision to arm their security guards, and made a point of putting that in her show, and was not asked to return" (2020, 10). Hudson additionally included a cheeky self-deprecating reference to Carla Rossi having lost "Best Portland Celebrity" in the Willamette Week Best of Portland Readers' Poll 2017 to The Unipiper, a unicycling bagpiper who wears a kilt and sometimes a Darth Vader mask (Hudson, "The Portland Wives," 15 March 2019).

continued with a loving, lacerating critique of Portland, Oregon as a “liberal mecca” overrun with “untreated white guilt” (Hudson, “The Portland Wives,” 15 March 2019). Hudson’s plot adroitly and humorously comments on the gentrification of the Alberta Arts district, a historically Black neighborhood that became an increasingly-white arts district after the first wave of artist gentrifiers in which neither the Black nor artist communities can afford to live any longer. Hudson’s preshows present this type of political commentary through a perspective that includes queerness, horror, queer failure, and camp.

FIGURE 5.8. The original “Queer Horror” painting by Jason Edward Davis that both inspired the creation of Queer Horror events and serves as the ongoing series’ logo. Art by Davis. Image courtesy of the artist.

Hudson approaches the creation of Queer Horror with the understanding that both horror and camp are queer art forms (2020d, 13), writing the one-act preshows affected and inspired directly by the queer “drag theatre of the eighties/the ACT UP era” (Hudson 2020c, 17). A queer politic permeates Hudson’s work, in which the Queer Horror event “becomes a weirdly spiritual and political and important exercise for me” (Hudson 2020c, 16). For Hudson, camp is an important queer political tool since “camp can become a way to zero in on just how absurd a political structure is. It’s by playing up the artifice so high that it exposes the artifice underlying everything at its core as we encounter it in the world” (2020d, 12-13). Hudson’s preshow intentions are both received and appreciated by the Queer Horror audience, as noted by survey participants:

What I like it is how the drag queen (Carla Rossi) performs small skits that relate to key points in the film while also providing contemporary social commentary on the films. In addition to this, having a drag queen introduce a film makes me feel more comfortable and, in a way, affirms that I am in a queer-friendly environment where I can be as queer as I wish to be (48160651).

Carla Rossi is a genius (47158068).

I attend Queer Horror in PDX - I like it because Carla Rossi talks about the social/political impact of the film and its significance (46932948).

FIGURE 5.9. Painting of Carla Rossi for the Queer Horror screening of The Stepford Wives (1975). Art by Jason Edward Davis. Image courtesy of the artist.

Hudson's Queer Horror preshow rosters feature an inclusive spectrum of local drag performers who are employed<sup>48</sup> to contribute engaging performances, which audience members enjoy. Narrator Hodges recounts enjoyment of "getting to see other drag queens show up and participate in [the preshows] and kind of get away from just lip-syncing and really doing more acting as a queen than lip-syncing as a queen. I think that's great. It also really queers the whole thing because you're like here's a drag queen acting out a scene from this kind of racist movie like Candyman" (2020, 20).<sup>49</sup> Queer Horror, like Midnight Mass before it, creates a queer space for queer audiences to investigate and appreciate the horrors in society, politics, and films safely in a space together.

The bimonthly Queer Horror screening series is a collaboration between partners in life and sometimes in art, Anthony Hudson and Jason Edward Davis, Queer Horror's resident artist. Davis paints art "based on the movie we were gonna watch" and sells it in the theatre lobby at the shows (2020, 21). Hudson is the show writer, programmer, and host as Portland's premier drag clown Carla Rossi. Carla Rossi is performed in whiteface, a deft and silent social criticism, which Hudson explains is in "direct allusion to whiteness, clowning, and as a critical inversion of blackface" (Hudson n.d.). Carla Rossi's embodiment and self proclamation as a drag clown (as opposed to the more common terms drag queen/king), holds particular resonance when regarded with the culturally significant "special power of the clown" (Ludlam 1992, 30).<sup>50</sup> Carla Rossi, as a

---

<sup>48</sup> As Queer Horror started to sell out the theatre, Hudson sought also to employ other local drag talent, stating: "I realized that Queer Horror was now becoming a new queer drag nightlife event. And it was becoming a standby that people could depend on. As we were selling out and as we were getting more and more attention and as the Mercury came out and called us 'a goddamn Portland treasure'—that was nice—I realized that I also had a responsibility to bring on as many performers as I could, and as many female-assigned performers as I could, and as many trans performers as I could, to really show what I saw as the breadth of talent in the drag world in Portland. And to try to foster a space where performers could actually get paid an actual guarantee—and actually get paid something that reflects their time. Even still, what we pay now I don't think is appropriately relative to how much work they're putting in. But we're still paying much more than most shows" (2020c, 14).

<sup>49</sup> Since the film's initial release in 1992, conversations about Candyman (directed by Bernard Rose) have included critiques of the film's racial stereotyping and centering of whiteness. Even with the film's problematic issues, Candyman ranks as number 32 on survey participants' favorite horror films list. The 2020 release of the new version of Candyman, directed by Nia DaCosta and produced by Jordan Peele's Monkeypaw Productions, was delayed because of the COVID-19 pandemic but is set to be released late 2021. This version is anticipated to directly deal with racial issues.

<sup>50</sup> Carla Rossi can also be linked to the carnivalesque's tradition of the fool as a critical figure engaged in social disruption. Bakhtin, in Rabelais and his World, "not only connect[s] the Fool with Carnival but also attach[s] the central concepts of ambivalence, degradation and laughter to the Fool" (Aston 2005, 12).

queer form of performance art, is laced with Hudson's eviscerating political wit aimed directly at white supremacy and cisheteronormativity, as informed by Hudson's half-Native (Confederated Tribes of Grand Ronde) and half-German heritage, as well as Hudson's nonnormative gender and sexuality. Carla Rossi wields the clown's special power of being able to "say serious things in a way that [they] cannot be punished for" (Ludlam 1992, 30). When the Queer Horror event series first started, the programming was focused on films that have a direct queer connection to horror, containing explicit (sub)textual queerness in the narrative or being a film by a queer director, writer, and/or actor.<sup>51</sup> As Queer Horror evolved, Davis explains, the understanding of what makes a horror film queer became more amorphous: "We know it's queer when we know it. . . . some films are queer just by queer people watching them" (2020, 21). Being a live cinema event, Queer Horror is more than solely a film screening or a drag performance, as narrator Stodola proclaims: "Queer Horror is the Holy Trinity, honestly. It's a horror movie that I wanted to see, I wanted to see the drag show, and it was the idea of being around a bunch of queer people who wanted to see the same old horror movie as me" (2020, 19). The "live" augmented amalgamation of queerness, horror, performance, and drag creates an experience that only exists in that space, for that duration, for those attendees. The temporary queer community forged through the Queer Horror series has lasting value in queers' lives, as narrator Hodges emphasizes: "The big draw for me is that feeling of community" (2020, 20). Underscoring the importance of live cinema events creating queer spaces and forging a queer community, narrator Stodola comments "I haven't really had the experience of being around queer audiences since Queer Horror. It's harder in smaller communities and small areas where it's not as safe to be out. I definitely miss that. I miss being able to walk in and knowing that this is my spot. I know exactly what I'm about. I know what everyone else is about. I'm here" (2020, 26). Stodola's comment confirms not only the importance but also the need for the temporary queer communities created at events such as Midnight Mass and Queer Horror. These queer communities create feelings of safety and solidarity, all in celebration of queerness, the art of drag, and the horror genre.

---

<sup>51</sup> For a complete list of the films screened at Queer Horror up to June 2021, see Appendix C.

FIGURE 5.10. Carla Rossi painted in stylistic exaltation of Angela Franklin from Night of the Demons (1988). Art by Jason Edward Davis. Image courtesy of the artist.

5.8 When Live Cinema Becomes a Significant Queer Event

Both Grannell and Hudson write, create, and perform their original preshows, at Midnight Mass and Queer horror respectively, to augment the experience of the screened horror film they program specifically for a queer audience. As a survey participant writes: “They always talk about whichever film through a queer context/lens and how meaningful/impactful these films have been to queer people, either individually or as a community, and how the films, when seen through a queer lens, portray our experiences with mainstream/straight society” (46826839). The drag performance Grannell and Hudson use in their live cinema experiences strengthens the queer bond to horror through their creation of safe, connective, and celebratory queer spaces. These live cinema experiences have the ability to shift the queer connection to horror, as narrator Hodges states: “Going to Queer Horror has changed how I think about horror” (2020, 11). Moreover, their intentional “combining [of] queer culture and horror” (47122859) makes both Midnight Mass and Queer Horror movie events that form temporal and temporary communities blending identity (queer) with genre (horror).<sup>52</sup> Being events for queer audiences that are “festivalized by means of their rarity” and contain accompanying “live content” (Dickson 2018, 90), Midnight Mass and Queer Horror exist as ritualized experiential ephemera and are thus distinct as a new class of specialized temporality in live cinema studies. In fact, when queers gather together for an event that celebrates a shared love of the horror genre, they create a “queer temporal mode governed by the ephemeral, the temporary, and the elusive” (Halberstam 2011, 54). These transitory exhibition temporalities imbue “the festival with a sense of ‘event’ . . . that is bound up in the ontology of the festival” (Atkinson and Kennedy 2018, 79). Similarly, because of Midnight Mass’s and Queer Horror’s rarity, liveness, and queerness, these live cinema experiences are understood by audience members to be events that enhance “interactivity and community” (47001519). Numerous survey participants noted that they enjoy seeing drag performers introduce horror films because it feels like an event:

Welcome element of communal kitsch, nice to be at an event with queer visibility (46895883).

It made watching the movie feel like an actual event and not just here’s a movie you could be watching at home (46938033).

---

<sup>52</sup> This type of live cinema event is in contrast with film festivals, which tend to be based solely on business (i.e. Cannes Film Festival), identity (i.e. Jewish Film Festival), or genre (i.e. DOC NYC) (2018, 83).

The showmanship really made the viewing more of an event. It was much more exciting especially when the drag queen is as passionate about the film as the audience (47165769).

I enjoyed the sense of community and event that it built (47718111).

It becomes more of an event than just going with friends to see a movie. We dress up, kind of a combination of goth and camp. And it means the audience is likely going to be made up of majorly lgbtq people, which is a different environment. It's our space. Also, the jokes in the pre-show are often relevant in a way that feels cathartic (48010204).

Grannell and Hudson, reciprocally with their audiences, transform Midnight Mass and Queer Horror into serialized queer live cinema events. The seriality of these queer live cinema events is significant because regularly repeated screenings establish known queer spaces and events for queer horror spectators, giving queers something to look forward to, something they know will bring them together around a shared passion and their shared nonnormativity.

The queer audiences of Midnight Mass and Queer Horror reject cisheteronormativity and embrace their shared nonnormativity. Queer horror audiences collectively participating in horror fandom “allow[s] for sexual expression and nonconformity (as well as subversion and the rejection of heteronormativity), namely through the display of queer performance” (Lynskey 2020, 31). As Hudson notes, the Queer Horror “audience is rowdy, but they’re not disruptive and everyone is on the same wavelength. You can tactilely feel the flow of energy in the room—I sound so Sedona right now—but you can feel everyone experiencing the jolts, the pangs. All the queer coding comes out explicitly when you’re in that crowd with that audience. We all dial in” (2020c, 15). Through my own “active participation in and observation of” both events (Atkinson and Kennedy 2018, 19), I attest that the audience energy and art performances of these live cinema experiences are joyous, rowdy, campy, raunchy, and inclusive queer expressions of horror fandom in the public sphere. My observations are supported by a survey participant who breaks down the dynamic simply: “Audience interaction. Audience participation. Breaking the fourth wall. Audience reaction” (47567830). Another survey participant highlights how a queer live cinema event functions to create a shared journey for the queer audience:

What's not to like! I enjoy the campy, macabre, over the top elements of horror more than the gore and violent elements, so it feels fun to be able to celebrate those elements in my own queer community instead of at home by myself. . . . I am delighted and also, I guess, comforted, by some kind of campy psychopomp mediating between the world of reality and the underworld of scary fantasy (47470912).

The shared queer joy and energy of concomitantly celebrating drag, camp, and horror remains unchanged, whether evidenced by Midnight Mass (1998-2009), Queer Horror (2015-present), or other events by drag performers who present horror films to queer audiences. In fact, narrator Alex Hall describes this same specific energy at the Queer Fear series in Toronto:

To explain Queer Fear to someone who's never been . . . it's the pairing of the two—drag and horror film—and the drag performance always has to do with the movie itself. I wish I could remember the performances better. It's curated by a gay man who stated that he was new to Toronto. . . . He opens the film with some context of his reading of what the significance of the film is within the queer horror canon. They've done The Birds; obviously, A Nightmare on Elm Street 2, which I missed, but I snagged a poster from a billboard. So I have that commemorating a queer experience. It's a very energetic space (2020, 19).

While I have never attended Queer Fear and Hall has never attended Midnight Mass or Queer Horror, our experiences with these live cinema events mirror one another. My experience as a Midnight Mass and Queer Horror participant over decades, combined with the oral history interviews and survey responses, indicates that all live cinema experiences with drag horror hosts are imbued with a particular queer energy, one that is at once joyfully defiant and exuberantly Other and that is generated from a marginalized community finding shared temporary release, in this case through horror, a marginalized genre.<sup>53</sup> Narrator Hodges, when discussing Queer Horror, states that “being around a bunch of queer people when you're queer is totally addictive,” alluding to the queer energy that is at once unparalleled and uncommon for queers to experience in <sup>53</sup> Even though the survey did not ask participants to name which drag artist they saw introduce a horror film, the qualitative survey responses combined with my perspective after years as participant and staff member for Midnight Mass and an active participant and observer of Queer Horror, indicate that queer live cinema events in general are imbued with a similar queer energy.

---

their daily lives (2020, 20). Similarly, narrator Kim Thompson discusses how watching horror films with queer audiences augments the experience:

Being in a crowd with other queer people and just enjoying together this particular genre, which we have all somehow come to and are united in agreeing that this is this really magic moment of cinema history that we all, for some reason, really, really enjoy. It's just really a magic feeling to be in that space surrounded by your people enjoying this thing that you get so much joy from. It kind of magnifies the experience, really (2020, 24).

Narrator Alex Hall further confirms that queer live cinema events hold “a different energy, obviously when you’re in a public space with a bunch of queer people, queer strangers. And it’s not just going to your regular queer film fest, too. It has a different energy. And maybe coming from people that are into horror or the fact that you’re going to see a horror film—it’s a particular kind of energy and queer energy” (2020, 20-21). This specific queer energy results from a drag horror host exhibiting a horror film to a queer audience, regardless of film, location, or drag performer, as well as resulting from the act of queer horror fans coming together to simultaneously celebrate their queerness and their love of horror film. In fact, those two elements coexist because “sharing films is a way for people to share their lives, their identities and parts of their emotional fabric with others” (Levitt 2018, 21). In darkened theatres, queers have found connections on the screen and with other audience members because “cinema as an institution creates pockets of queer space, time, and experience” (Schoonover and Galt 2016, 266-267). Queer live cinema events such as Midnight Mass and Queer Horror can be understood as Foucauldian heterotopias that are localizable places existing “outside of all places” (1986, 24). The temporary queer spaces created through these live cinema horror events become shared experiences that can only exist within the bounds of their place outside normative existence. “Cinema persists in queer culture as a site of political ferment,” Schoonover and Galt explain, while “it also provides spaces in which to nourish more diffuse experiences of affinity, belonging, and intimacy” (2016, 20). Midnight Mass and Queer Horror as live cinema events accentuate the collective experiences of queer solidarity whilst they also create spaces for “exploring and celebrating the intersection between queerness and horror” (48537827).

5.9 Evidencing Queer Live Cinema with Empirical Data

The establishment of the queer connection to “queered” live cinema is first evidenced by the case studies of Midnight Mass and Queer Horror and will be further evidenced by my study’s empirical data. To date, in live cinema studies, researcher observation has been privileged over direct audience engagement, or empirical data collection, with the result that “even when the work provides an account of audience experiences, their voices are hardly present” (Vivar 2018, 120). Methodological practices that evade direct engagement with audiences are neglecting a fundamental aspect of the live cinema experience, as live theatre requires an audience and that audience becomes a part of the performance itself. Atkinson and Kennedy wrote in 2017 that live cinema studies “remains largely uncharted” and made a “call to all researchers to take up the continued mapping and critical study of this ever-evolving field and its ecosystems of production and participation” (2018, 267). Therefore, this research and intervention into live cinema studies represents that direct engagement and incorporates voices from queer audiences and performers of queer live cinema events.<sup>54</sup> The following comment from a survey participant, writing about what they enjoy about taking part in a live (horror) cinema experience, underscores the importance of both a queer audience and a drag performance for queer horror fans: “Sometimes the horror film fan world can feel very straight, but to me (and I’m sure many others) it’s always felt very closely connected to queerness, and seeing a drag queen introduce the film felt like a confirmation that I was in a room where I felt understood and that it was a special occasion” (47336309). For the audience to feel that a film screening is a special occasion, the total live cinema experience—or “the unifying aspect of live cinema events [which] seems to be their connection to and enhancement of a specified film” (Jones 2018, 197)—is manifested, in this case through horror film curation, drag performances, and the shared energy of a queer audience.

Queerness, drag, and horror film exist at a confluence of reclamation and reanimation because queer people, drag performers, and horror fans are all

---

<sup>54</sup> The Live Cinema EU Final Project Report indicates that nonnormative genders are disproportionately attracted to live cinema experiences, highlighting that the queer community requires further consideration as a distinctive live cinema audience. The report states: “Most notably in terms of gender is the 8% of audiences defining themselves as ‘other’, indicating that live cinema events have particular appeal to a non-binary audience above the population average (1% in the UK, Gender Identity Research & Education Society)” (2018, 12).

marginalized communities that exist at the periphery of normativity, individuals and groups who transgress the norms and boundaries of mainstream acceptance and “respectability.” My survey data soundly demonstrates that the majority of queer horror fans both engage with drag performance and prefer to see horror films with queer audiences.<sup>55</sup> 65.1 percent ( $n = 2,666$ ) of queer horror fans have been to a drag show, while 1,105 (77.7 percent) of the 1,430 who have not been to a drag show would like to go. This large majority engagement with drag illustrates, undeniably, that queer spectators of horror connect with the art of drag.<sup>56</sup> Further, 54 percent ( $n = 2,207$ ) of queer horror fans strongly agree or agree that they most enjoy watching horror films with queer audiences, with only 4.6 percent strongly disagreeing or disagreeing with that statement.<sup>57</sup> Considering that queer people are not often afforded the opportunity to watch horror films together, this data strongly demonstrates the queer community’s need and desire for more occasions to gather to watch horror films. While live cinema events such as Midnight Mass and Queer Horror combine queers’ desire to be within a queer audience to watch horror films with drag performance, the majority of the oral history narrators have, unfortunately, not seen a drag performer introduce a horror film, and only 15.7 percent ( $n = 642$ ) of the survey participants have been to a movie theatre to watch a drag queen introduce a horror film with a short drag preshow.<sup>58</sup> An overwhelming majority of survey participants, 87.8 percent ( $n = 3,019$ ), would like to see a drag queen introduce a horror film in a movie theatre, as would all of the oral history narrators who have not yet had that opportunity. Even though a significant segment of queer horror spectators have not been to a queer live cinema event hosted by a drag performer, the fact that the overwhelming majority of survey

---

<sup>55</sup> Moreover, as discussed in Chapter 3, horror fans whose queerness creates a different reaction to and taste in horror films, indeed, have the queerest relationship to horror and are therefore more inclined to enjoy watching horror films with queer audiences. There are positive correlations with the following statement: “I most enjoy watching horror films with queer audiences” (“different reaction”  $r_s = .34, p < .000$  and queer “taste”  $r_s = .35, p < .000$ ), both with moderate effect.

<sup>56</sup> 65.4 percent ( $n = 2,679$ ) of survey participants have watched RuPaul’s Drag Race, with 21.7 percent being “Avid” fans. 21.7 percent ( $n = 889$ ) have watched The Boulet Brothers’ Dragula, with 30.5 percent being “Avid” fans. The survey was released before The Boulet Brothers’ Dragula seasons 2 and 3 were available on Netflix (October 31, 2019); undeniably, the viewer and fan numbers for this show would have ranked higher after more mainstream availability.

<sup>57</sup> 34.5 percent “Neither Agree or Disagree” with the statement and a further 6.9 percent “Don’t Know.”

<sup>58</sup> Similarly, only 23 percent ( $n = 941$ ) have attended a live musical adaptation of a horror film such as Carrie, Evil Dead, Re-Animator, etc.; yet, a resounding 82 percent ( $n = 2,582$ ) would like to see a live musical adaptation of a horror film.

participants want to see a drag horror host suggests that the primary limiting factors are lack of access or being unaware of such events. The queer live cinema events mentioned in this study are located in urban areas (San Francisco, Portland, Toronto, Manchester, and the Tampa Bay area), indicating that these events are localized in cities with significant queer communities. While the future of live events is still undetermined at the time of writing this study due to the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic, this study's mixed-method data patently indicates that queer horror fans would attend these events if other drag performers created these meaningful queer experiences.

The appeal for queer people to see a drag queen introduce a horror film, in part, stems from the temporary centering of queerness that comes from having a space be reclaimed by and for queers. George Chauncey states that "there is no queer space; there are only spaces used by queers or put to queer use" (2014, 202). Queer performers presenting queered horror film to queer audiences is an act of queer reclamation in which a theatrical space is put to queer use. A survey participant speaks directly to this queer reclamation when they state: "It felt like a reclamation of a hetero-bro genre, a 'queering' and even celebration of otherness from a different perspective that facilitated a fresh approach to viewing with an audience very much attuned to my own life experience" (47799428). Narrator Lana Contreras further evidences the importance of claimed queer space when she states: "I feel like a queer space is a safe space to be who you are, be acknowledged of who you are, and not fear that something might happen" (2020, 22). Similarly, narrator Hodges clarifies that events such as Queer Horror create "space where I don't have to think about my identity anymore because everyone around me is accepting and gets it. . . . When you're in a space like that you can all celebrate the fact that you're fucking queer and, at the same time, stop giving it the negative space that it can sometimes take up in your mind" (2020, 20). Narrators Kaitlyn Stodola and Mark Estes both further underscore the importance of having queer space and queer connection within it:

Queer Horror was one of my first experiences going and being around other queer people, and seeing that they like the same movies as me, and a lot of them wear the same kind of clothes as me. I'm like they're all super nice and they're super fun and super sweet, even though we're seeing horror movies about people getting murdered [laughs], and it was such a huge thing. And we waited after the show and we went up and we talked to Anthony, and Anthony was so nice and just immediately was like, [in their best Carla voice] ‘Oh, my babies welcome.’ I wanted to cry because I was like, I have a place now. I can be here and I can interact with other people who are like me and like the same things as me (Stodola 2020, 16).

I want to see a horror movie or a queer horror movie in a crowd with a bunch of queer people and just sit there and be with the family. I haven’t yet got to see that, but it’s on my bucket list. Like if they got to bring my ashes in there and just put me in the damn seat, that’ll still be great. I feel like that’s a rite of passage for any queer horror fans—to sit there and watch a movie with your peers. Maybe Hello Mary Lou: Prom Night II. Maybe Sleepaway Camp. Maybe, hell, something new that’s coming out. It could be campy. It could be serious. Just something where I could sit there and look at the person next to me and be like we’re here. We might be a different shade of people—we’re different shades, different backgrounds—but we’re all here on this screen (Estes 2020, 28).

Queer audiences remain fundamentally disenfranchised from cisheteronormative society. For this reason, they find a specific queer connection in the collective experience of watching horror films. A live cinema horror screening with a queer audience, or a “participatory screening,” “acts as a space for the Other, one who may be subject to discrimination and marginalisation by heteronormative society, to express a certain queer identity and disengage this marginalisation through transgressive acts” (Lynskey 2020, 34). As a survey participant affirms, queer people have “a physical representation that all horror films are based in, the concept of being the ‘othered’ or rejected by the mainstream” (46896918). This quote emphasizes both an emotionality and an explicit awareness of queer as Other. Another survey participant corroborates this when they share that they like seeing a drag queen introduce a horror film in a movie theatre because of “the sense of community and empowerment that comes from the shared experience of a lot of people on the outside of the social status quo being able to be in a big role or position. Also, there’s a great, high energy created typically due to the theatrical nature of drag” (47082773). In fact, the majority of 585 survey participant written responses (from those who had seen a drag queen introduce a horror film with a preshow [ $n = 642$ ]) emphasize the importance of queer audience interaction with, participation in, and reaction to live cinema events with drag horror hosts such as Midnight Mass and Queer Horror.

While the emerging field of live cinema has yet to investigate explicitly queer events or audiences, Rosana Vivar has empirically examined the San Sebastian Horror and Fantasy Film Festival (Horror Week). Vivar's findings reveal the masculinized behaviors of Horror Week fans, which comparatively have a marked difference to queer horror audiences. Vivar observes that the Horror Week "festivalgoers engage in boisterous acts of disapproval towards films and guests that are introduced during the screenings" (2018, 117). Vivar notes the comments "Take your panties off!" and "I just got a hard on!" as "the most recurrent phrases dedicated to female guests that venture on to stage" (2018, 127). Conversely, the queer audiences of Midnight Mass and Queer Horror engage in boisterous acts of approval and, indeed, love, towards both films and guests. For example, Midnight Mass was centered on the "worship" of cult and horror films.<sup>59</sup> As Grannell states: "We are coming together to worship movies like Faster, Pussycat! Kill! Kill! at this fellowship called Midnight Mass. And Tura Satana is our idol. Varla is our idol and we're going to worship her" (2020c, 4).<sup>60</sup> The "worshippers" at both Midnight Mass and Queer Horror are queer spectators from all genders and sexualities—both on the stage and in the audience to complete the holistically inclusive space. Vivar writes about "the overwhelming presence of men in horror-themed events," citing examples from both Horror Week and research by Van Extergem (2004) (2018, 124). Vivar concludes that "Horror Week is a good example of horror and fantasy film viewing contexts being sites that provide room for certain conservative facets of masculinity in the public sphere" (2018, 132), further contrasting the behaviors and tone of that audience compared with the queer audiences of Midnight Mass and Queer Horror. The tonal distinction between "queer" and "straight" live <sup>59</sup> The idea of reverent worship is built into the very name of the series, Midnight Mass. Grannell grew up going to Catholic school and chose the moniker Peaches Christ directly from that childhood experience, which scarred him. Grannell directly noted the influence Catholicism had on his work, including how his live cinema series came to be known as Midnight Mass: "I just remember Martiny [Michael Brenchley] being like, 'Well, you should call it Midnight Mass because you're Peaches Christ.' It was like the heavens opened up and a choir sang. I knew in that moment that that is absolutely what it had to be called. To this day, I'm so grateful because I've been able to use not only my own Catholic bullshit—which is a love hate relationship with the Catholic Church. I love the iconography and I'm still very into the gothic horror of the Catholic Church, but I also hate its politics and its misogyny and homophobia and all that stuff. It was this perfect way for me to exorcise that bullshit while also really being able to couch this experience correctly in a symbolic way" (2020c, 5).

---

<sup>60</sup> While Faster, Pussycat! Kill! Kill! is not commonly considered a horror film, Grannell explains the "horror" within the cult classic: "So even if I'm doing Faster, Pussycat! Kill! Kill!—while not necessarily a horror film—I would argue that it's transgressive enough that it horrified straight men and it really intimidated people" (2020c, 9).

cinema events, particularly considered with the empirical data that evidences the research participants' overwhelming desire to experience a queer live cinema event, underscores the individual, social, cultural, and academic impact of queer spectators gathering and celebrating both their queerness and their shared love of horror at these events.

5.10 Film as the Cinematic Church of Queer Community

This chapter has used evidence from survey participants, oral history narrators, and case studies on Grannell's Midnight Mass and Rossi's Queer Horror to argue that the queerness of the audiences and the drag performers is fundamental—that a theatre full of queer horror fans is vital—to these live cinema experiences. Hanich discusses collective film viewing as “a theory and phenomenology of the influence other spectators have on our film experience and the influence we have on theirs” (2018, 4). However, queer horror fans primarily exist as imagined and temporary communities, rarely having the opportunity to gather physically in large numbers to celebrate anything, much less horror film. These live cinema events with drag horror hosts offer queers the opportunity to move from imagined to intentional communities. Ulrika Dahl observes that researching cultural events, as conducted here with Midnight Mass and Queer Horror, “reveals that community is made and remade through the events that bring people together” (2010, 153).

FIGURE 5.11. “Peaches Christ Saved My Soul at Midnight Mass” sweatshirt. Graphic design by Chris Hatfield. Image courtesy of Peaches Christ Productions.

Queer people find a stabilizing commonality and inspiring energy when gathered together as an audience of horror films.<sup>61</sup> Nicholas Ray famously referred to film as “the cathedral of the arts” (Scheibel 2017, 110), an observation that directly reflects the film medium’s ability to incorporate all other artforms. Film as an art form and a joint social action offers sanctuary to queers. Grannell highlights this point, stating: “I do believe that for some of us, films were our salvation. They were the things that became our teachers, our guides to living. And so, in many ways, I do think my love for film and the film-going experience is equivalent to going to church” (2020c, 5). Cinema creates queer connections and meaning, as evidenced in this study, that go beyond what may be expected or evidenced otherwise. Survey participants and narrators referring to movie theatres as queer community “church” is a significant designation of spiritual meaning and ritual worship. Hudson further evidences this idea of movie theatres/cinema being the place for a devotional experience of queers as they gather to celebrate something we love, horror: “I think of Queer Horror as a church in a way. There is something holy that happens when you gather all of us together in a space” (2020c, 15). Hudson’s philosophy is shared by Queer Horror attendees; as one survey participant states, “Carla Rossi is the Hollywood’s High Priestess. I go to that church” (46893342). Narrator Stodola also used this language of spiritual fellowship, noting that attending Queer Horror “is definitely like church. It’s a feeling of coming home almost” (2020, 18).

Given how organized religion, historically and presently, harms and ostracizes queers, many queers must make and/or find their congregations elsewhere. Émile Durkheim, when discussing the sociology of religion, states that “the very act of congregating is an exceptionally powerful stimulant. Once the individuals are gathered together, a sort of electricity is generated from their closeness and quickly launches them into an extraordinary height of exaltation” (quoted in Morrison 2006, 240). For many queers, that joy is found in a theatre connecting with other queers over their shared love of horror, over an embrace of being Others together. Grannell, reflecting on the beginning of Midnight Mass, shares his experience of that connection taking shape around his events:

My best memory is that people were really grateful to find their tribe and Midnight Mass, and Peaches, in a lot of ways, was a lighthouse or a beacon that attracted these people. Even in San Francisco, queer folks—men, women, trans folks—who loved horror, who loved this transgressive stuff, who loved trash or things that were dismissed as trash—we were the church that allowed them to gather” (2020c, 14).

---

<sup>61</sup> A survey participant alludes to the energy of viewing horror films with queer audiences in comparison to non-queer audiences, writing that “heterosexual viewers are boring to watch horror films with and heterosexual men especially” (47082256).

This evidences, as explained by Durkheim, how social gathering is essential for creating community bonds. Queers gathering in theatres to celebrate horror films creates temporally and spatially bound bonds within the queer community, functioning as liberating carnivalesque spaces in which queer people celebrate their shared nonnormativity.

5.11 The Future of Queer Live Cinema

Live cinema events represent queer possibilities and collectivity in horror fandom, with the temporarily reclaimed spaces and sense of community being vital to queer community, even if the majority of fans have yet to have the opportunity to experience live cinema events such as Midnight Mass and Queer Horror due to limitations in access and exposure. This precious queer space and communing is threatened by the global pandemic that rages as I write this work.<sup>62</sup> Most movie theatres in the United States have been closed for over a year, and will not fully reopen for many months still.<sup>63</sup> Current evidence indicates that cinemas will not fully recover from the COVID-19 pandemic prolonged closures, certainly in the United States.<sup>64</sup> The institutions that do survive will need more than film exhibition alone to draw cinema audiences back to the theatre post pandemic. Live cinema events will, indeed, prove valuable as well as meaningful to attract people away from their homes, with mobile devices and streaming platforms, and back into theatres. Live cinema events such as <sup>62</sup> Hudson maintains the importance of sharedness and liveness within Queer Horror events, noting that the live cinema event cannot exist without the queer energy from the queer horror audience: “In this weird time of quarantine, I miss Queer Horror. People are like, ‘Will you do a Queer Horror livestream?’ And I’m like, ‘No.’ Because the magic is when we’re all together in the audience” (2020c, 18).

---

<sup>63</sup> My local independent cinema, The Hollywood Theatre, where Queer Horror has been hosted since 2015, has been closed from March 14, 2020 through the time of this writing, June 2021. In fact, my last unused pre-purchased cinema ticket was to celebrate Queer Horror’s 5th Anniversary in March with a screening of The Lure (2015), a queer horror film, which has yet to be rescheduled.

<sup>64</sup> See: “The Future of Film: Can Cinema Survive Covid-19?” by Wendy Ide (July 12, 2020); “The Future of Movie Theaters In the Age of Coronavirus: A Dialogue” by Brent Lang, Owen Gleiberman, and Peter Debruge (October 8, 2020); “How Much Do You Really Miss Going to the Movies?” by A.O. Scott (October 16, 2020); and “Movie Theaters Aren’t Dying—They’re Being Murdered” by Jeet Heer (December 4, 2020).

Midnight Mass and Queer Horror offer “new forms of embodiment and new possibilities for community engagement and participation” (Atkinson and Kennedy 2018, 20). The coronavirus pandemic will alter the future of all queer spaces, as it has hastened the closure of dedicated queer spaces such as bars and clubs. The post-pandemic trauma is likely to be significant within the queer community, taking longer for some to adjust to life after the COVID-19 pandemic, since many queer community members, primarily Generation X and older, remember and hold trauma due to the AIDS epidemic. This current pandemic has and will continue to exacerbate queer inequalities, which may lead to additional trauma, furthering what sociologist DaShanne Stokes identifies as existing due to “politics and widespread discrimination,” creating “significant disparities in LGBT [queer] medical rights and health care outcomes” (2020, 81). Stokes further details how preexisting “health care disparities amplified by the pandemic are set to magnify LGBT social and political inequality on a national scale. In addition, the pandemic has contracted space in public discourse and media coverage—which is needed to advance LGBT equality—creating new opportunities for exploitation to advance anti-LGBT political agendas” (2020, 81). Queer people, particularly queer BIPOC, remain at the marginalized peripheries of cisheteronormative societies medically, socially, politically, and economically. With the ability for the queer marginalized community to gather in queer spaces or theatres potentially permanently altered due to the pandemic, the possibilities are reduced for queer horror fans collectively to experience horror films. As this chapter affirms, experiencing and celebrating horror together holds the utmost significance to queer spectators, queer performers, and drag horror hosts. Queers who create horror spaces for our queer community recognize the need for a horror connection forged in queerness and camp that outwardly embraces the nonnormative and queer failure. These temporary queer live cinema events are transformed into cult horror events of the carnivalesque by both the drag hosts and the queer audiences through their very liveness and sharedness. In particular, the case studies of Midnight Mass and Queer Horror demonstrate how queer horror events expand the “embodied live experience” (Atkinson and Kennedy 2018, ix) and make much-needed space for the queer spectators of horror in live cinema studies.

Conclusion

I wanted to be part of this research project because the face of horror or horror fans is a white man. I'm not a white man... I just want to go ahead and be like, I exist. I like horror. I understand the theories. I've read the books. My opinion is just as important as yours. Frankly, better because I've lived through oppression. I know fear. What do you know? (Contreras 2020, 15).

I think a queer audience can engage more with ideas at play in horror such as the disruption of normal life, disgust (in monster movies), physical otherness (body horror), and the sense of regaining control through the final girl (47336309).

I have understood that, as a queer person, I am not wanted in certain parts of society. I am feared, loathed, hated. This is similar to the narrative that horror movies get from mainstream audiences, so naturally, I think there is a connection between a queer viewer and their taste in horror (47100424).

The primary objective of this research has been to document for the first time the opinions, habits, and tastes of the queer horror spectator, ultimately arguing that queers have a distinctive spectatorial relationship with the genre unlike any other horror audience demographic. While queers statistically favor the horror genre as compared with heterosexual moviegoers (Nielsen 2015), the queer penchant for horror film had not previously been considered empirically, and certainly not for the full spectrum of the queer community. This study's groundbreaking mixed-method dataset on the queer horror spectator challenges the disembodied theory of the academy to include the embodied queer experience, which both allows for better understanding of queer subjectivity and empirically evidences theories from fields such as queer, horror, camp, trauma, and live cinema studies. Empirically engaging actual audiences is imperative since horror is, fundamentally, an affective genre. In other words, the affect of the horror genre should be understood through its lived impact on spectators, rather than only through removed theoretical hypotheses.

As established, this research is a product of my queerness, my queer trauma, and, significantly, my lifelong love of horror. As a lifelong queer horror spectator myself, this research was deeply personal and a way to establish queer visibility since "writing is a method of rejecting invisibility; a protest statement against denial and absence; a witness statement of existence” (Smith and Molloy 2019, 215). My research goal was to render visible a vital spectatorial community, the queer horror spectator, and to bring queerness to the forefront of horror studies. Therefore, directly engaging the queer horror spectator using queered methods was fundamental to this effort. The results of that spectator engagement led to this study’s mixed-method dataset, which unquestionably demonstrates that queer spectators of horror distinctively engage with horror film. Narrator Joshua Grannell affirms this queer connection to horror, observing that “the queer audience attaches to horror more deeply and takes it with them and appreciates it on a deeper level” (2020a, 19). When Brigid Cherry researched and theorized “whether the female audience can be considered as a distinct entity within the horror film audience as a whole and, more importantly, whether they watch horror films differently than male viewers” (1999, 58), her study found that female horror fans did, indeed, engage with horror film differently than male viewers. Queer horror spectators likewise view horror film differently than heterosexual viewers, and the majority of queer spectators report that their queerness alters their reactions and tastes in horror film, which directly links queer marginality to horror. This project’s 4,107 survey participants and 15 oral history narrators enable me to establish authoritative observations about the queer horror spectator and to demonstrate that queers form a unique group of horror spectators. This study thereby makes an indelible impact on the critical fields of horror, queer, trauma, camp, film, and live cinema studies.

Chapter 1 argues that the queer spectator’s connection to horror film is both theoretical and ontological in part due to film itself being queer. In their “account of cinema as an inherently queer medium,” Karl Schoonover and Rosalind Galt ask “readers to think about film history as always already queer” (2016, 18). Building on Schoonover and Galt’s deliberately and enticingly provocative declaration, this study recognizes the queerness of the filmic medium and argues that horror is ontologically the queerest genre, a generic condition that is also perceived by horror’s queer spectators. This queer connection to the horror genre is bolstered by the fact that a disproportionate number of early horror theorists are queer and their work, ultimately, fostered the development of horror studies as an academic discipline. Harry Benshoff and Sean Griffin posit that “another way to conceptualize queer film is to think about the ways that various types of films or film genres might be considered queer” (2006, 11). The genre is queer in part because, as they state, “the horror film, for example, often depicts bizarre and monstrous sexualities that can be considered queer” (Benshoff and Griffin 2006, 11). This study empirically documents and firmly establishes that horror is queer, altering the critical understandings of horror film, horror criticism, horror spectatorship, and horror audiences by focusing on not the representational and allegorical but the ontological. This research, through the elucidation of mixed-method data, demonstrates incontrovertibly that queer spectators both “think” and “feel” that the horror genre is queer and queerly relate to the genre. As the first (but hopefully not the last) empirical study on the queer relationship to the horror genre, documenting actual spectators has proven indispensable since “audience research is about what people think and feel about movies. Audience research is a means for testing and verifying or refuting the scholarship on the meanings of film images” (Austin 1989, ix). This study’s data results ultimately indicate that both a person’s queerness is the most salient aspect of identity when it comes to horror affinity, and embodied queerness affects the horror experience in return.

Chapter 2 outlines the overall methodological approach to the entire project as being queer and delineates how the queering of research methods is essential to this study. This is deliberately and decidedly a queer project; the queer thinking of the research participants was combined with the queer academics’ work with which I engaged, both functioning to inform my own queer thinking. All scholarship is interpretation, with this study specifically being a mediated representation of the queer horror spectator and, therefore, susceptible to bias and error. Consequently, multiple steps were taken to ensure the integrity of this research project and its data. One step was to explicate and analyze transparently the research design, which simultaneously functions as a form of transparency itself. This study, the culmination of years of research, sought to eliminate, or at the very least limit, confirmation bias in this research by being transparent, which further illustrates how transparency is fundamental to a sound methodology from beginning to end. This chapter explicitly details the methodological and theoretical challenges of a queer researcher working with a queer community, including the complications due to identifying potential survey respondents through non-probability sampling and the limitations of statistically analyzing non-mutually exclusive data. This study employed the non-probability sampling method since the entire global population of queer spectators of horror film could not be known and, therefore, not every horror-loving queer could have had the opportunity to respond to the survey. Reliance on mutually-exclusive data would have proved harmful to a significant proportion of this study's survey participants since queer embodiment is complex and fluid, with many queer people, myself included, existing beyond binaristic boundaries and across multiple labels. Queer researchers need to continually reconsider and reconceptualize normative boundaries and institutional norms to push scholarship to always be more inclusive and equitable.<sup>1</sup>

In Chapter 3, I transmuted empirical evidence into the first cohesive and comprehensive portrait of the queer horror spectator and their opinions, habits, and tastes. This chapter presents an inclusive queer spectator of horror, established from 4,107 survey participants who are a full spectrum of genders, sexualities, races, ethnicities, ages, cultures, nationalities, and educational levels. The overall and overwhelming consensus of the survey responses, combined with the participants' demographic data, allowed me to create the first, as well as a comprehensive, understanding of the queer spectator of the horror genre. The queer spectator is both a knowledgeable and an active horror fan who first watched horror as a child. For the queer spectator, a love of horror connects them to other queers who embrace the genre similarly, as well as functioning as a bridge to connect with non-queers (a demographic with different sensibilities and understandings). The horror-loving queer watches horror films from around the globe and enjoys positive representations of strong women and queer characters in horror. For the queer spectator, love for the entire genre takes precedence over individual films, as they love or like the majority of horror subgenres. The mixed-method data on the queer horror spectator is compared in this study with Brigid Cherry's empirical data on the female horror fan to illustrate distinction. The queer spectator connects to the monsters, the victims, and the final girls of horror, finding an embodied queer connection to horror's Other and narratives of victimization and survival. The majority of survey participants report that their queerness alters their reactions to and tastes in horror, with these queer spectators being more inclined to enjoy horror's camp aesthetics and to recognize the therapeutic and cathartic benefits of the genre because queers have "a more intimate relationship with trauma" (47704161). The prevalence and passion of horror-loving queers is a call to makers and event organizers to include safe spaces for queer horror fans, particularly since queer spectators report feeling underrepresented on the horror screen and in horror fandom.<sup>2</sup> This chapter, in all, evidences, illustrates, and demonstrates a vehement and distinctive queer spectatorship of horror, transforming critical understandings of both the horror genre and the queer spectator.

---

<sup>1</sup> Specifically, I call upon universities, ethics boards, and researchers when doing research that engages human subjects to be proactive by ensuring that BIPOC and/or LGBTQ+ research subjects are compensated for their time and contributions.

Chapter 4 documents queer trauma as being processed therapeutically through horror films and finding joyous expression through the queer spectator's camp relationship to horror. This chapter explicates the interwoven theoretical topics of queerness, horror, trauma, and camp. This is accomplished by empirically evidencing the queer spectator's conscious therapeutic engagement with horror, finding a relationship that goes deeper than queer representation in films, and ultimately argues for horror's ability to alleviate queer suffering cathartically. This data corroborates some previously posited trauma theories in horror studies whilst breaking ground empirically, altogether substantiating the fundamental connections between the fields of horror, queer, and trauma studies. Since all queer people suffer from the insidious trauma of living in a cisheterosexual world and since, as Laura Westengard asserts, trauma demands expression, this study found queer expression in the queer spectator's therapeutic engagement with horror and development of a camp relationship to the genre. Significantly, the survey data undeniably evidences that "camp can be located within a system of queer praxis" (Taylor 2012, 75). Queers recognize that horror and camp share an aesthetic, subtextual, and transgressive foundation. For queers of all genders, camp is a key facet to engaging with horror, leading to a camp relationship to the horror genre. This queer camp relationship to horror underscores that camp is felt and embodied because, as narrator Joe Fejerman explains, camp is “something experiential” (2020, 37). Since queers connect to the horror genre due to its intrinsic queerness and since camp is a queer sensibility, the camp-horror nexus is fundamentally queer.

---

<sup>2</sup> Future research should explicitly engage queer horror spectators about both organized horror fandom and their understandings of and distinctions between being a horror fan and being part of horror fandom.

Queer embodiment is informed by insidious queer trauma, which, in turn, informs the queer camp sensibility. As such, Chapter 5 argues that an important queer intervention, squarely in the field of live cinema studies, is horror exhibition for queer audiences curated and hosted by drag performers. Drawing from and contributing to theories of liveness, sharedness, laughter, the carnivalesque, cult, and queer failure, the chapter details and examines the work of Peaches Christ (Joshua Grannell) and Carla Rossi (Anthony Hudson) creating the live cinema events Midnight Mass and Queer Horror (respectively), which are situated in the histories of drag and horror hosts. The mixed-method data illustrates how these queer live cinema events both represent the queer contributions to live performance and create consequential spaces for queer spectators of horror. Queers gathering together to queerly celebrate a film genre they love strengthens queer community bonds and enhances the queer spectator’s connection to horror. This study’s distinctive intervention in live cinema studies should signal to scholars in horror studies, queer studies, and film studies that queer live cinema events are a vital area of inquiry.

While the majority of horror-loving queers will feel seen and understood by this work, others will feel as outliers to my specific research findings even though they, too, have their own distinctive relationship with the genre. I acknowledge the limits of my findings and recognize that, since there were 4,107 survey participants, there are 4,107 idiosyncratic queer relationships to the horror genre. These distinct relationships have been collected, interpreted, and presented through mixed-method data in order to elucidate patterns and understandings. To be abundantly clear, this study’s findings do not speak for or to the entire queer community nor, indeed, homogenize the entire horror-loving queer community. While extrapolations of statistical results are presented throughout this study and indicate percentages that would be found in the entire population of queer horror film spectators, no single question had 100 percent consensus. Therefore, this study does not intend to collapse the entire community of queer horror spectators into one simplified and commodifiable archetype. Regardless, since this study is the first comprehensive empirical investigation into queer spectators of horror, as established, I have privileged presenting and understanding community similarities and consensus over differences. Future researchers from within intersectional queer communities should investigate preliminary data found in this study, such as the queer American Indian's or Alaska Native's relationship to the horror genre<sup>3</sup> or the transgender male spectator's love of werewolf films.<sup>4</sup>

The immensity of this study's mixed-method dataset means that not only do multiple avenues remain under or uninvestigated,<sup>5</sup> but also researching, examining, and analyzing the queer spectatorial relationship to horror film continues to be relevant because neither queerness nor the horror genre are stable or ceasing. I echo Julian Hanich, who borrows from Susanne Langer in stating "that nothing in this study is exhaustively treated and that every subject demands further analysis, research, and invention" (2018, 275). The cultural work of the horror genre will shift with society, while "queer is an identity category that has no interest in consolidating or even stabilizing itself. . . . [Q]ueer is always an identity under construction" (Jagose quoted in Doan 2019, 122). Future research should investigate how the queer relationship to horror changes over time, particularly in comparison with this dataset. In other words, this study's vast mixed-method data should be compared and contrasted with future empirical studies on queer horror spectatorship. Additionally, future mixed-method research should investigate the topics that my data analysis work has determined are particularly relevant and noteworthy.<sup>6</sup> For example, the data demonstrates that one's queerness alters and affects the queer relationship to horror; therefore, future research should collect direct empirical data on queer spectator's attitudes and understandings of their queerness. The survey's

---

<sup>3</sup> The American Indian or Alaska Native survey participants ( $n = 119$ ) report the highest percentage of both horror fandom and knowledgeability. 97.5 percent ( $n = 116$ ) consider themselves a fan of horror film and 89.1 percent ( $n = 106$ ) consider themselves knowledgeable about horror film.

<sup>4</sup> Trans men report loving werewolf films at the highest percentage, 36.9 percent ( $n = 123$ ), as compared to the data on cis women (25.6 percent), cis men (24.5 percent), and trans women (26.7 percent).

<sup>5</sup> To reiterate, the aggregate results from my survey and over 6,000 cross-tabulation reports from the survey data are available to future researchers through MMU. This study had time and space limits, however the data lives in perpetuity; therefore, this is an explicit call to queer researchers both to use this study's data and to create new data for ongoing understanding of the queer horror spectator.

<sup>6</sup> There are several survey questions with which this study does not deeply engage due to limits in research breadth and relevancy. For example, the survey asked participants about which formats and with whom they usually watch horror films but the study did not engage with that data due to space limitations.

written responses and the oral history interviews, together forming the qualitative data, reveal that a significant percentage of queer horror spectators consider the horror genre to be intrinsically queer. Future studies, therefore, should collect empirical spectator data about the intrinsic queerness of the horror genre.<sup>7</sup> Relatedly, future research should collect empirical spectator data on queer attitudes regarding queer assimilation and liberation. This information could lead to a more nuanced and complex understanding of the queer spectator of horror and how a queer person's attitudes towards queer community status informs their relationship to the horror genre.

For over four years, I have been submerged in queer thought—both theoretical and embodied—about the horror genre, resulting in the largest quantitative and qualitative study on the spectatorship of horror film. This queer research project has been a transformative experience for me, as well as for horror studies, queer studies, trauma cinema studies, camp studies, live cinema studies, and, hopefully, for all the queer spectators of horror out there. The survey data combined with the oral histories patently demonstrate that queer people have a distinctive relationship to the horror genre. Much of queer history highlights queer trauma and/or works to rectify queer invisibility, so much so that Westengard pointedly states that “insidiously traumatized time is haunted time is queer time” (2019, 21). Indeed, this study recognizes and theorizes our insidious queer trauma and the haunted nature of queer subjectivity—particularly having been written during a global pandemic that has exacerbated both queer trauma and the queerness of time. Yet, simultaneously, I intently and joyously focus on camp as an affirming and ebullient manifestation of queer trauma. Reading through thousands of thoughtful, informed, and, many times, intimate written responses from the anonymous survey participants has reaffirmed my conviction in the potential of radical queerness. Social movements can be “spontaneous or organized” (Luders 2016, 186) or, more specifically, can be a fluid combination of proactive organization, cultural reaction, and temporal spontaneity. This work affirms my assertion that there is an ever-building movement of queers declaring horror as queer. These declarations from the queer community further confirm horror as queer, particularly when considered with expanding academic attention on queer horror,<sup>8</sup> increasing production of explicitly queer horror films,<sup>9</sup> growing number of explicitly queer horror podcasts,<sup>10</sup> and Shudder's in-progress documentary film on queer horror.<sup>11</sup> While these external artifacts do not legitimize the already substantial queer horror community, they affirm what we each have known to be true about our relevance. Mathias Clasen states that "the best works of horror have the capacity to change us for life" (2017, 147).<sup>12</sup> This study argues that queer lives have the capacity to change horror. The queer spectator, with their queer lens, engages with horror film in fundamentally queer ways and, in the process, transforms the genre into something wholly new. The conclusions of this academic study are resolutely both a political act and an intervention, seeking to move the discourse about queerness in horror beyond the textual, subtextual, and representational, to bring the embodied queer spectator and queer audiences from the periphery to the center of horror studies.

---

<sup>7</sup> There are additional questions that were not asked but became clear as being salient during data analysis, which are constructive indications for future research projects. For example, future research should collect data on queer spectators' “preparation” for the horror-viewing experience, such as dimming lights, watching at night, using headphones, etc., a topic additionally inspired by Xavier Aldana Reyes's Horror Film and Affect: Towards a Corporeal Model of Viewership (2016, 103).

---

<sup>8</sup> See, for example, the collection New Queer Horror: Film and Television (2020) edited by Darren Elliott-Smith and John Edgar Browning.

<sup>9</sup> Examples are Good Manners / As Boas Maneiras (2017), Rift / Rökkur (2017), Thelma (2017), Knife+Heart / Un couteau dans le cœur (2018), The Perfection (2018), What Keeps You Alive (2018), Bit (2019), Freaky (2020), and Spiral (2020).

<sup>10</sup> See Chapter 1, note 48, for an extensive list of queer horror podcasts.

<sup>11</sup> An original documentary film about the long history of queerness in horror is expected to be released on Shudder in late 2021.

<sup>12</sup> Clasen directly argues for horror's ability to develop and refine the film spectator's coping skills, alertness, empathy, morality, and emotionality (2017, 147).

Oral History Bibliography

Castro, Gabe. 2020. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. August 11th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Philadelphia, Pennsylvania (GC) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.

Colangelo, Harmony. 2020. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. July 29th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Cleveland, Ohio (HC) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.

Contreras, Lana. 2020. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. October 24th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Los Angeles, California (LC) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.

Davis, Jason Edward. 2020. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. March 3rd. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Portland, Oregon (JED and HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.

Estes, Mark O. 2020. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. October 4th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Memphis, Tennessee (MOE) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.

Fejeran, Joe. 2020. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. August 27th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. San Diego, California (JF) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.

Grannell, Joshua. 2020a. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. May 5th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. San Francisco, California (JG) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.

———. 2020b. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. May 7th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. San Francisco, California (JG) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.

———. 2020c. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. May 12th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. San Francisco, California (JG) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.

———. 2020d. Interview by Heather Oriana Petrocelli. May 19th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. San Francisco, California (JG) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.

- Hall, Alex. 2020. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. June 8th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Toronto, Canada (AH) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.
- Hodges, CJ. 2020. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. October 23rd. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Portland, Oregon (CJH and HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.
- Hudson, Anthony. 2020a. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. April 17th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Portland, Oregon (AH and HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.
- . 2020b. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. April 23rd. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Portland, Oregon (AH and HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.
- . 2020c. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. May 5th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Portland, Oregon (AH and HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.
- . 2020d. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. May 13th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Portland, Oregon (AH and HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.
- Ponder, Stacie. 2020. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. May 6th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Portland, Maine (SP) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.
- Stodola, Kaitlyn. 2020. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. May 12th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Newport, Oregon (KS) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.
- Thompson, Kim. 2020. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. October 29th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Nottingham, United Kingdom (KT) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.
- Varrati, Michael. 2020. Interview by Heather Oriana Petrocelli. May 21st. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Los Angeles, California (MV) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.
- Velasco, Christopher. 2020. Interview by Heather O. Petrocelli. July 12th. Queer for Fear Oral History Collection. Pasadena, California (CV) and Portland, Oregon (HOP). Transcript. Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, UK.

Bibliography

- Aaron, Michele. 2007. Spectatorship: The Power of Looking On. London: Wallflower Press.
- Abercrombie, Nicholas, and Brian Longhurst. 1998. Audiences: A Sociological Theory of Performance and Imagination. London: SAGE.
- Abley, Sean. 2013. Out in the Dark: Interviews with Gay Horror Filmmakers, Actors and Authors. Maple Shade, NJ: Lethe Press.
- Ahmad, Aalya, and Sean Moreland, eds. 2013. Fear and Learning: Essays on the Pedagogy of Horror. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.
- Ahmed, Sarah. 2006. Queer Phenomenology: Orientations, Objects, Others. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- . 2019. What's the Use? On the Uses of Use. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Akker, Robin Van den, Timotheus Vermeulen, and Alison Gibbons, eds. 2017. Metamodernism: Historicity, Affect, and Depth after Postmodernism. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Aldana Reyes, Xavier. 2016. Horror Film and Affect: Towards a Corporeal Model of Viewership. New York: Routledge.
- . 2017. "Dracula Queered." In The Cambridge Companion to Dracula, edited by Roger Luckhurst, 125-135. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2019. Gothic Cinema. London: Routledge.
- . 2020. "Abjection and Body Horror." In The Palgrave Handbook of Contemporary Gothic, edited by Clive Bloom, 393-410. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Alexander, Bryant. 2003. "Querying Queer Theory Again (or Queer Theory as Drag Performance)." Journal of Homosexuality 45, no. 2-4: 349-353.
- Alexander, Linda Lewis, Judith H. LaRosa, Helaine Bader, Susan Garfield, and William James Alexander. 2021. New Dimensions in Women's Health. 8th ed. Burlington, MA: Jones & Bartlett Learning.
- Alim, H. Samy, Jooyoung Lee, Lauren Mason Carris, and Quentin E. Williams. "Language, Race, and the (Trans)Formation of Cisheteropatriarchy." 2020. In The Oxford Handbook of Language and Race, edited by H. Samy Alim, Angela Reyes, and Paul V. Kroskrity, 291-314. UK: Oxford University Press.
- Allen, Graham. 2000. Intertextuality. London: Routledge.

- Amin, Kadji. 2019. "Haunted by the 1990s: Queer Theory's Affective Histories." In Imagining Queer Methods, edited by Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim, 277-293. New York: New York University Press.
- Anderson, Benedict. 2006. Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism. rev. ed. London: Verso.
- Anzaldúa, Gloria. 1987. Borderlands / La Frontera: The New Mestiza. San Francisco: Aunt Lute Books.
- Aston, Richard Michael. 2005. "The Role of the Fool and the Carnavalesque in Post-1945 German Prose Fiction on the Third Reich." PhD thesis, University of Oxford.
- Atkinson, Sarah. 2014. Beyond the Screen: Emerging Cinema and Engaging Audiences. New York: Bloomsbury Publishing.
- Atkinson, Sarah, and Helen W. Kennedy. 2016a. "Introduction — Inside-the-Scenes: The Rise of Experiential Cinema." Participations 13, no. 1 (May):139-151.
- . 2016b. "Live Cinema Conference." Conference Report. Alphaville: Journal of Film and Screen Media 12 (Winter): 133–40. <https://doi.org/10.33178/alpha>.
- , eds. 2018. Live Cinema: Cultures, Economies, Aesthetics. London: Bloomsbury Academic.
- . 2019. "The Live Cinema Paradox: Continuity and Innovation in Live Film Broadcast, Exhibition and Production." In The Palgrave Handbook of Screen Production, edited by Craig Batty, Marsha Berry, Kath Dooley, Bettina Frankham, and Susan Kerrigan, 335-346. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Auerbach, Nina. 1995. Our Vampires, Ourselves. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Auslander, Philip. 2008. Liveness: Performance in a Mediatized Culture, 2nd ed. New York: Routledge.
- Austin, Bruce A. 1989. Immediate Seating: A Look at Movie Audiences. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.
- . 2008. "Portrait of a Cult Film Audience: The Rocky Horror Picture Show." In The Cult Film Reader, edited by Ernest Mathijs and Xavier Mendik, 393-402. Berkshire: Open University Press.
- Austin, Thomas. 2002. Hollywood, Hype and Audiences: Selling and Watching Popular Film in the 1990s. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

- Babuscio, Jack. 1977. "Camp and the Gay Sensibility." In Gays and Film, edited by Richard Dyer, 40-57. London: British Film Institute.
- Bacon-Smith, Camille. 1992. Enterprising Women: Television Fandom and the Creation of Popular Myth. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Bakhtin, Mikhail. 1984. Rabelais and His World. Translated by Hélène Iswolsky. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Ballon, Bruce, and Molyn Leszcz. 2007. "Horror Films: Tales to Master Terror or Shapers of Trauma?" American Journal of Psychotherapy 61, no. 2: 211-230.
- Barker, Martin. 2006. "I Have Seen the Future and It Is Not Here Yet ...; or, On Being Ambitious for Audience Research." The Communication Review 9, no. 2: 123-141.
- . 2013. "Watching Rape, Enjoying Watching Rape ...: How Does a Study of Audience Cha(lle)nge Mainstream Film Studies Approaches?" In The New Extremism in Cinema: From France to Europe, edited by Tanya C. Horeck and Tina Kendall, 105-116. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Barker, Martin, and Ernest Mathijs, eds. 2008. Watching the Lord of the Rings: Tolkien's World Audiences. New York: Peter Lang Publishing.
- Barker, Martin, Kate Egan, Stan Jones, and Ernest Mathijs. 2008. "Researching The Lord of the Rings: Audiences and Contexts." In Watching the Lord of the Rings: Tolkien's World Audiences, edited by Martin Barker and Ernest Mathijs, 1-20. New York: Peter Lang Publishing.
- Barker, Martin, Ernest Mathijs, and Alberto Trobia. 2008. "Our Methodological Challenges and Solutions." In Watching the Lord of the Rings: Tolkien's World Audiences, edited by Martin Barker and Ernest Mathijs, 213-240. New York: Peter Lang Publishing.
- Barker, Martin, Kate Egan, Tom Phillips, and Sarah Ralph. 2016. Alien Audiences: Remembering and Evaluating a Classic Movie. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Barounis, Cynthia. 2018. "Witches, Terrorists, and the Biopolitics of Camp." GLQ 24, no. 2-3: 213-238.
- Baym, Nancy K. 2010. Personal Connections in the Digital Age. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Bazin, André. 1967. What is Cinema? Volume I. Translated by Hugh Gray. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Bell, James, ed. 2013. Gothic: The Dark Heart of Film. London: BFI.

- Benjamin, Walter. 1968. Illuminations: Essays and Reflections. Edited by Hannah Arendt. Translated by Harry Zohn. New York: Schocken Books.
- . 1999 [1929]. "Chaplin in Retrospect." In Walter Benjamin: Selected Writings. Vol. 2, 1927–1934, edited by Michael W. Jennings, Howard Eiland, and Gary Smith, 222–224. Translated by Rodney Livingstone and Others. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University.
- Benshoff, Harry M. 1997. Monsters in the Closet: Homosexuality and the Horror Film. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- . 2008. "1966: Movies and Camp." In American Cinema of the 1960s: Themes and Variations, edited by Barry Keith Grant, 150-171. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- Benshoff, Harry M., and Sean Griffin. 2006. Queer Images: A History of Gay and Lesbian Film in America. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Benson-Allott, Cattlin. 2013. Killer Tapes and Shattered Screens: Video Spectatorship from VHS to Film Sharing. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Berenstein, Rhona J. 1990. "Mommie Dearest: Aliens, Rosemary's Baby and Mothering." The Journal of Popular Culture 24, no. 2 (Fall): 55-73. https://doi.org/10.1111/j.0022-3840.1990.2402\_55.x.
- . 1995. "Spectatorship-as-Drag: The Act of Viewing and Classic Horror Cinema." In Viewing Positions: Ways of Seeing Film, edited by Linda Williams, 231-269. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- . 1996. Attack of the Leading Ladies: Gender, Sexuality, and Spectatorship in Classic Horror Cinema. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Bergman, David. 1993. "Strategic Camp: The Art of Gay Rhetoric." In Camp Grounds: Style and Homosexuality, edited by David Bergman, 92-112. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.
- Binson, Diane, Johnny Blair, David M. Huebner, and William J. Woods. 2007. "Sampling in Surveys of Lesbian, Gay, and Bisexual People." In The Health of Sexual Minorities Public Health Perspectives on Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Populations, edited by Ilan H. Meyer and Mary E. Northridge, 375-418. New York: Springer.
- Blake, Linnie. 2008. The Wounds of Nations: Horror Cinema, Historical Trauma and National Identity. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Blake, Linnie, and Agnieszka Soltysik Monnet. 2017. "Introduction: Neoliberal Gothic." In Neoliberal Gothic: International Gothic in the Neoliberal Age, edited by Linnie Blake and Agnieszka Soltysik Monnet, 1-18. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

- Boellstorff, Tom. 2007. A Coincidence of Desires: Anthropology, Queer Studies, Indonesia. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- . 2010. "Queer Techne: Two Theses on Methodology and Queer Studies." In Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research, edited by Kath Browne and Catherine J. Nash, 215-230. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Booth, Mark. 1983. Camp. New York: Quartet Books.
- Bozzuto, James C. 1975. "Cinematic Neurosis Following The Exorcist: Report of Four Cases." Journal of Nervous and Mental Disease 161, no. 1: 43–48.
- Bradley, Matt. 2007. "Silenced for Their Own Protection: How the IRB Marginalizes those it Feigns to Protect." ACME: An International Journal for Critical Geographies 6, no. 3: 339-349.
- Brickman, Barbara Jane. 2016. "'A Strange Desire That Never Dies': Monstrous Lesbian Camp in the Age of Conformity." Discourse 38, no. 3 (Fall): 356-389.
- . 2017. "Voyage to Camp Lesbos: Pulp Fiction and the Shameful Lesbian 'Sicko'." In Sontag and the Camp Aesthetic: Advancing New Perspectives, edited by Bruce E. Drushel and Brian M. Peters, 3-28. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.
- Brim, Matt. 2020. Poor Queer Studies: Confronting Elitism in the University. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Bronski, Michael. 1984. Culture Clash: The Making of Gay Sensibility. Boston: South End Press.
- Brooker, Will, and Deborah Jermyn, eds. 2003. The Audience Studies Reader. London: Routledge.
- Brooks, Daphne A. 2006. Bodies in Dissent: Spectacular Performances of Race and Freedom, 1850-1910. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Brophy, Philip. 1986. "Horrority—The Textuality of Contemporary Horror Films." Screen 27, no. 1: 2-13.
- Browne, Kath. 2010. "Queer Quantification or Queer(y)ing Quantification: Creating Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual or Heterosexual Citizens through Governmental Social Research." In Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research, edited by Kath Browne and Catherine J. Nash, 231-249. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Browne, Kath, and Catherine J. Nash, eds. 2010. Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research. Farnham: Ashgate.

- Browning, John Edgar. 2017. "Horror Criticism." In Horror Literature through History: An Encyclopedia of the Stories That Speak to Our Deepest Fears, Volume One, edited by Matt Cardin, 97-101. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO.
- Bruckman, Amy. 2002. "Ethical Guidelines for Research Online." Accessed July 2, 2020. <http://www.cc.gatech.edu/~asb/ethics/>.
- Brunt, Rosalind. 1992. "Engaging with the Popular: Audiences for Mass Culture and What to Say about Them." In Cultural Studies, edited by Lawrence Grossberg, Cary Nelson, and Paula Treichler, 69-80. New York: Routledge.
- Bryman, Alan. 2016. Social Research Methods. 5th ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Bundtzen, Lynda K. 1987. "Monstrous Mothers: Medusa, Grendel and Now Alien." Film Quarterly 40, no. 3: 11-17.
- Burston, Paul, and Colin Richardson, eds. 1995. A Queer Romance: Lesbians, Gay Men, and Popular Culture. London: Routledge.
- Butler, Ivan. 1970. Horror in the Cinema. New York: Paperback Library Edition.
- Butler, Judith. 1990. Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity. New York: Routledge.
- . 1994. "Against Proper Objects. Introduction." differences: A Journal of Feminist Cultural Studies 6, no. 2+3: 1-26.
- . 1997. "Performative Acts and Gender Constitution: An Essay in Phenomenology and Feminist Theory." In Writing on the Body: Female Embodiment and Feminist Theory, edited by Katie Conboy, Nadia Medina, and Sarah Stanbury, 401-417. New York: Columbia University Press.
- . 2004. Undoing Gender. New York: Routledge.
- Cantor, Joanne, and Mary Beth Oliver. 1996. "Developmental Differences in Responses to Horror." In Horror Films: Current Research on Audience Preferences and Reactions, edited by James B. Weaver and Ron Tamborini, 63-80. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.
- Carnes, Neal. 2019. Queer Community: Identities, Intimacies, and ideology. London: Routledge.
- Carroll, Noël. 1987. "The Nature of Horror." The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism 46, no. 1 (Autumn): 51-59.
- . 1990. The Philosophy of Horror: Or, Paradoxes of the Heart. New York: Routledge.

- Caruth, Cathy. 1996. Unclaimed Experience: Trauma, Narrative, and History. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Case, Sue-Ellen. 1988-89. "Towards a Butch-Femme Aesthetic." Discourse 11, no. 1: 55-73.
- . 1991. "Tracking the Vampire." differences: A Journal of Feminist Cultural Studies 3, no. 2: 1-20.
- Casetti, Francesco. 2015. The Lumière Galaxy: Seven Key Words for the Cinema to Come. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Castle, Terry. 1993. The Apparitional Lesbian: Female Homosexuality and Modern Culture. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Chamberlain, Edward A. 2020. Imagining LatinX Intimacies: Connecting Queer Stories, Spaces and Sexualities. London: Rowman & Littlefield International.
- Chapman, James. 2013. Film and History. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Chauncey, George. 2014. "Privacy Could Only Be Had in Public: Gay Uses of the Streets (1995)." In The People, Place, and Space Reader, edited by Jen Jack Giesecking, William Mangold with Cindi Katz, Setha Low, and Susan Saegert, 202-206. New York: Routledge.
- Cherry, Brigid. 1999. "The Female Horror Film Audience: Viewing Pleasures and Fan Practices." PhD thesis, University of Stirling.
<http://hdl.handle.net/1893/2268>.
- . 2002. "Screaming for Release: Femininity and Horror Film Fandom in Britain." In British Horror Cinema, edited by Steve Chibnall and Julian Petley, 42-57. London: Routledge.
- . 2008. "Gothics and Grand Guignols: Violence and the Gendered Aesthetics of Cinematic Horror." Participations 5, no. 1 (May): n.p.
https://www.participations.org/Volume%205/Issue%201%20-%20special/5\_01\_cherry.htm.
- . 2009. Horror. New York: Taylor & Francis.
- . 2016. Cult Media, Fandom, and Textiles: Handicrafting as Fan Art. London: Bloomsbury Academic.
- Chibnall, Steve, and Julian Petley, eds. 2002. British Horror Cinema. London: Routledge.
- Church, David. 2021. Post-Horror Art, Genre, and Cultural Elevation. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Chute, David. 1983. "Outlaw Cinema." Film Comment 19, no. 5: 9-15.

- Clarens, Carlos. 1997. An Illustrated History of Horror and Science-Fiction Films: The Classic Era, 1895-1967. Boston: Da Capo Press.
- Clasen, Mathias. 2017. Why Horror Seduces. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Clemens, Valdine. 1999. The Return of the Repressed: Gothic Horror from The Castle of Otranto to Alien. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Cleto, Fabio, ed. 1999. Camp: Queer Aesthetics and the Performing Subject: A Reader. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Clover, Carol J. 1987. "Her Body, Himself: Gender in the Slasher Film." Representations 20 (Autumn): 187-228.
- . 1992. Men, Women, and Chain Saws: Gender in the Modern Horror Film. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- . 2015. Men, Women, and Chain Saws: Gender in the Modern Horror Film. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Cohen, Jacob. 1988. Statistical Power Analysis for the Behavioral Sciences. 2nd ed. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaums.
- Collins, Patricia Hill. 2000. Black Feminist Thought: Knowledge, Consciousness, and the Politics of Empowerment. 2nd ed. New York: Routledge.
- Connor, Andrea. 2017. The Political Afterlife of Sites of Monumental Destruction: Reconstructing Affect in Mostar and New York. New York: Routledge.
- Conrad, Ryan, ed. 2014. Against Equality: Queer Revolution, Not Mere Inclusion. Edinburgh: AK Press.
- Conrich, Ian, ed. 2010. Horror Zone: The Cultural Experience of Contemporary Horror Cinema. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Coppa, Francesca. 2014. "Fuck Yeah, Fandom is Beautiful." The Journal of Fandom Studies 2, no. 1: 73-82.
- Core, Philip. 1984. Camp: The Lie That Tells the Truth. New York: Putnam Publishing Group.
- Cornesse, Carina, Annelies G. Blom, David Dutwin, Jon A. Krosnick, Edith D. De Leeuw, Stéphane Legleye, Josh Pasek, Darren Pennay, Benjamin Phillips, Joseph W. Sakshaug, Bella Struminskaya, and Alexander Wenz. 2020. "A Review of Conceptual Approaches and Empirical Evidence on Probability and Nonprobability Sample Survey Research." Journal of Survey Statistics and Methodology 8, no. 1: 4-36.
<https://doi.org/10.1093/jssam/smz041>.

- Cotter, Robert Michael. 2017. Vampira and Her Daughters: Women Horror Movie Hosts from the 1950s into the Internet Era. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.
- Coverley, Merlin. 2020. Hauntology: Ghosts of Futures Past. Harpenden: Oldcastle Books.
- Crane, Jonathan Lake. 1994. Terror and Everyday Life: Singular Moments in the History of the Horror Film. London: SAGE.
- Creed, Barbara. 1986. "Horror and the Monstrous-Feminine: An Imaginary Abjection." Screen 27, no. 1 (January/February): 44-70.
- Crenshaw, Kimberlé. 2018 [1989]. "Demarginalizing the Intersection of Race and Sex: A Black Feminist Critique of Antidiscrimination Doctrine, Feminist Theory, and Antiracist Politics." In Feminist Legal Theory: Readings in Law and Gender, edited by Katharine T. Bartlett and Rosanne Kennedy, 57-80. New York: Routledge.
- Cristofari, Cécile, and Matthieu J. Guitton. 2017. "Aca-fans and Fan Communities: An Operative Framework." Journal of Consumer Culture 17, no. 3: 713-731.
- Crosby, Emily Deering, and Hannah Lynn. 2017. "Authentic Artifice: Dolly Parton's Negotiations of Sontag's Camp." In Sontag and the Camp Aesthetic: Advancing New Perspectives, edited by Bruce E. Drushel and Brian M. Peters, 47-62. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.
- Dahl, Ulrika. 2010. "Femme on Femme: Reflections on Collaborative Methods and Queer Femme-inist Ethnography." In Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research, edited by Kath Browne and Catherine J. Nash, 143-166. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Davis, Angela Y. 1990. Women, Culture, & Politics. New York: Vintage Books.
- . 1999. Blues Legacies and Black Feminism: Gertrude "Ma" Rainey, Bessie Smith, and Billie Holiday. New York: Vintage Books.
- Davis, Colin, and Hanna Meretoja, eds. 2020. "Introduction to Literary Trauma Studies." In The Routledge Companion to Literature and Trauma, edited by Colin Davis and Hanna Meretoja, 1-8. London: Routledge.
- de Bruyn, Dirk. 2014. The Performance of Trauma in Moving Image Art. Newcastle upon Tyne: Cambridge Scholars Publishing.
- Deleuze, Gilles, and Félix Guattari. 2004. A Thousand Plateaus: Capitalism and Schizophrenia. Translation by Brian Massumi. London: Continuum.
- Derrida, Jacques. 1980. "The Law of Genre." Translated by Avital Ronell. Critical Inquiry 7, no. 1: 55-81.

- . 1994. Specters of Marx: The State of the Debt, the Work of Mourning and the New International. Translated by Peggy Kamuf. New York: Routledge.
- Derry, Charles. 1987. "More Dark Dreams: Some Notes on the Recent Horror Film." In American Horrors: Essays on the Modern American Horror Film, edited by Gregory A. Waller, 162-174. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Detamore, Mathias. 2010. "Queer(y)ing the Ethics of Research Methods: Toward a Politics of Intimacy in Researcher/Researched Relations." In Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research, edited by Kath Browne and Catherine J. Nash, 167-182. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Dhoest, Alexander, and Nele Simons. 2012. "Questioning Queer Audiences: Exploring Diversity in Lesbian and Gay Men's Media Uses and Readings." In The Handbook of Gender, Sex, and Media, edited by Karen Ross, 260-276. London: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Dickson, Lesley-Ann. 2018. "'Beyond Film' Experience: Festivalizing Practices and Shifting Spectatorship at Glasgow Film Festival." In Live Cinema: Cultures, Economies, Aesthetics, edited by Sarah Atkinson and Helen W. Kennedy, 83-100. London: Bloomsbury Academic.
- Dickinson, Roger, Ramaswami Harindranath, and Olga Linné, eds. 1998. Approaches to Audiences: A Reader. London: Arnold.
- Dickstein, Morris. 1984. "The Aesthetics of Fright." In Planks of Reason: Essays on the Horror Film, edited by Barry Keith Grant, 65-78. Metuchen, NJ: The Scarecrow Press.
- Dika, Vera. 1987. "The Stalker Film, 1978-81." In American Horrors: Essays on the Modern American Horror Film, edited by Gregory A. Waller, 86-101. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Doan, Petra L. 2019. "To Count or Not to Count: Queering Measurement the Transgender Community." In Imagining Queer Methods, edited by Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim, 121-142. New York: New York University Press.
- Doty, Alexander. 1993. Making Things Perfectly Queer: Interpreting Mass Culture. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- . 2000. Flaming Classics: Queering the Film Canon. New York: Routledge.
- Dyer, Richard, ed. 1977. Gays and Film. London: British Film Institute.
- . 1988. "Children of the Night: Vampirism as Homosexuality, Homosexuality as Vampirism." In Sweet Dreams: Sexuality, Gender and Popular Fiction, edited by Susannah Radstone, 47-72. London: Lawrence and Wishart.

- . 1990. Now You See It: Studies on Lesbian and Gay Film. London: Routledge.
- . 1993. The Matter of Images: Essays on Representations. London: Routledge.
- . 2002. The Culture of Queers. London: Routledge.
- Duggan, Lisa. 2003. The Twilight of Equality?: Neoliberalism, Cultural Politics, and the Attack on Democracy. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Dumas, Chris. 2014. "Horror and Psychoanalysis: An Introductory Primer." In A Companion to the Horror Film, edited by Harry M. Benshoff, 21-37. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Edo, Umberto. 2008. "Casablanca: Cult Movies and Intertextual Collage." In The Cult Film Reader, edited by Ernest Mathijs and Xavier Mendik, 67-75. Berkshire: Open University Press.
- Edelman, Lee. 2004. No Future: Queer Theory and the Death Drive. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Edmonds, W. Alex, and Thomas D. Kennedy. 2017. An Applied Guide to Research Designs Quantitative, Qualitative, and Mixed Methods. 2nd ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: SAGE.
- Elliott-Smith, Darren. 2013. "The Homosexual Vampire as a Metaphor for... the Homosexual Vampire?: True Blood Homonormativity and Assimilation." In True Blood: Investigating Vampires and Southern Gothic, edited by Brigid Cherry, 139-154. London: I.B. Tauris.
- . 2016. Queer Horror Film and Television: Sexuality and Masculinity at the Margins. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Emmel, Nick. 2013. Sampling and Choosing Cases in Qualitative Research: A Realist Approach. London: SAGE.
- Eversley, Shelly, and Laurie Hurson. 2019. "Like Inciting a Riot: Queering Open Education with EqualityArchive.com." In Imagining Queer Methods, edited by Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim, 248-258. New York: New York University Press.
- Faderman, Lillian. 1991. Odd Girls and Twilight Lovers: A History of Lesbian Life in Twentieth-Century America. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Farmer, Brett. 2000. Spectacular Passions: Cinema, Fantasy, Gay Male Spectatorships. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Fielding, Nigel G., Raymond M. Lee, and Grant Blank. 2017. The SAGE Handbook of Online Research Methods. 2nd ed. London: SAGE.

- Fischer, Lucy, and Marcia Landy. 1987. "Eyes of Laura Mars: A Binocular Critique." In American Horrors: Essays on the Modern American Horror Film, edited by Gregory A. Waller, 62-78. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Fisher, Mark. 2014. Ghosts of My Life Writings on Depression, Hauntology and Lost Futures. Alresford, UK: Zero Books.
- Fisiak, Tomasz. 2014. "Hag Horror Heroines: Kitsch/Camp Goddesses, Tyrannical Females, Queer Icons." In Redefining Kitsch and Camp in Literature and Culture, edited by Justyna Stępień, 41-51. Newcastle upon Tyne: Cambridge Scholars.
- Fiske, John. 1992a. "The Cultural Economy of Fandom." In The Adoring Audience: Fan Culture and Popular Media, edited by Lisa A. Lewis, 30-49. London: Routledge.
- . 1992b. "Cultural Studies and the Culture of Everyday Life." In Cultural Studies, edited by Lawrence Grossberg, Cary Nelson and Paula Treichler, 154-173. New York: Routledge.
- . 2003. "Understanding Popular Culture." In The Audience Studies Reader, edited by Will Brooker and Deborah Jermyn, 112-116. London: Routledge.
- Fleming, Amanda C. 2016. "In Search of the Child Spectator in the Late Silent Era." In Making Sense of Cinema: Empirical Studies into Film Spectators and Spectatorship, edited by Carrielynn D. Reinhard and Christopher J. Olson, 119-138. New York: Bloomsbury Academic.
- Follows, Stephen. 2017. The Horror Report. Accessed November 6, 2019. <https://stephenfollows.com/horrorreport/>.
- Follows, Stephen, and Bruce Nash. 2016. "The Relative Popularity of Genres Around the World." Los Angeles: American Film Market. Accessed March 25, 2019. <https://americanfilmmarket.com/relative-popularity-genres-around-world/>.
- . 2018. "What the Data Says: Producing Low-Budget Horror Films." Los Angeles: American Film Market. Accessed December 17, 2019. <https://americanfilmmarket.com/what-the-data-says-producing-low-budget-horror-films/>.
- Foucault, Michel. 1978. The History of Sexuality, Volume 1: An Introduction. Translated by Robert Hurley. New York: Random House.
- . 1986. Translated by Jay Miskowic. "Of Other Spaces." Diacritics 16, no. 1 (Spring): 22-27.
- . 1995. Archaeology of Knowledge. London: Routledge.

- Freccero, Carla. 2007. "Queer Spectrality: Haunting the Past." In A Companion to Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer Studies, edited by George E. Haggerty and Molly McGarry, 194-213. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Freeland, Cynthia A. 2016. The Naked And The Undead: Evil and the Appeal of Horror. New York: Routledge.
- Freeman, Elizabeth. 2010. Time Binds: Queer Temporalities, Queer Histories. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Freud, Sigmund. 1955 [1919]. "The 'Uncanny'." In The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud Vol. XVII. Translated and edited by James Strachey, 219-256. London: Hogarth Press.
- Freund, Katharina, and Dianna Fielding. 2013. "Research Ethics in Fan Studies." Participations 10, no. 1 (May): 329-334.
- Frayling, Christopher. 2013. "Foreword." In Gothic: The Dark Heart of Film, edited by James Bell, 5-7. London: BFI.
- Galt, Rosalind, and Karl Schoonover. 2016. Queer Cinema in the World. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Gelder, Ken, ed. 2000. The Horror Reader. New York: Routledge.
- Ghaziani, Amin. 2019. "Methodological Problems and Possibilities in Gayborhood Studies." In Imagining Queer Methods, edited by Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim, 103-120. New York: New York University Press.
- Ghaziani, Amin, and Matt Brim, eds. 2019. Imagining Queer Methods. New York: New York University Press.
- Gillis, John R., ed. 1994. Commemorations: The Politics of National Identity. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Gingrich-Philbrook, Craig. 2003. "Queer Theory and Performance." Journal of Homosexuality 45, no. 2-4: 353-356.
- Giroux, Henry A. 2021. Race, Politics, and Pandemic Pedagogy: Education in a Time of Crisis. London: Bloomsbury Academic.
- GLAAD. 2017. "Accelerating Acceptance 2017: A Harris Poll Survey of Americans' Acceptance of LGBTQ people." Accessed June 24, 2020. <https://www.glaad.org/publications/accelerating-acceptance-2017>.
- GLAAD Media Institute. 2020. "Studio Responsibility Index 2020." Accessed July 24, 2020. <https://www.glaad.org/sri/2020>.
- Google. 2017. "The Women Missing from the Silver Screen and the Technology Used to Find Them." Accessed May 24, 2019. <https://www.google.com/intl/en/about/main/genderequalityfilms/>.

- Gordon, Phillip. 2019. Gay Faulkner: Uncovering a Homosexual Presence in Yoknapatawpha and Beyond. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi.
- Gorman-Murray, Andrew, Lynda Johnston, and Gordon Waitt. 200. "Queer(ing) Communication in Research Relationships: A Conversation about Subjectivities, Methodologies and Ethics." In Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research, edited by Kath Browne and Catherine J. Nash, 97-112. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Grant, Barry Keith, ed. 1984. Planks of Reason: Essays on the Horror Film. Metuchen, NJ: The Scarecrow Press.
- , ed. 1996. The Dread of Difference: Gender and the Horror Film. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- , ed. 2008a. American Cinema of the 1960s: Themes and Variations. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- . 2008b. "Science Fiction Double Feature: Ideology in the Cult Film." In The Cult Film Reader, edited by Ernest Mathijs and Xavier Mendik, 76-87. Berkshire: Open University Press.
- . 2010. "Screams on Screens: Paradigms of Horror." The Journal of the Canadian Game Studies Association 4, no. 6: 1-17.
- Grant, Catherine, and Kate Random Love. 2019. Fandom as Methodology: A Sourcebook for Artists and Writers. London: Goldsmiths Press.
- Gravetter, Frederick J., and Larry B. Wallnau. 2011. Essentials of Statistics for the Behavioral Sciences, 7th ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.
- . 2017. Statistics for the Behavioral Sciences. 10th ed. Boston: Cengage Learning Solutions.
- Gray, Jonathan, Cornel Sandvoss, and C. Lee Harrington, eds. 2007. Fandom: Identities and Communities in a Mediated World. New York: New York University Press.
- , eds. 2017. Fandom: Identities and Communities in a Mediated World. Second Edition. New York: New York University Press.
- Grzanka, Patrick R. 2019. "Queer Survey Research and the Ontological Dimensions of Heterosexism." In Imagining Queer Methods, edited by Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim, 84-102. New York: New York University Press.
- Haefele-Thomas, Ardel. 2012. Queer Others in Victorian Gothic: Transgressing Monstrosity. Cardiff: University of Wales Press.
- Haggerty, George E. 2006. Queer Gothic. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

- Halberstam, J. 1995. Skin Shows: Gothic Horror and the Technology of Monsters. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- . 2003. "Reflections on Queer Studies and Queer Pedagogy." In Queer Theory and Communication: From Disciplining Queers to Queering the Discipline(s), edited by Gust A. Yep, Karen E. Lovaas, and John P. Elia, 361-364. Binghamton, NY: Harrington Park Press.
- . 2005. In a Queer Time and Place: Transgender Bodies, Subcultural Lives. New York: New York University Press.
- . 2011. The Queer Art of Failure. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- . 2012. "Gothic." In Lesbian Histories and Cultures: An Encyclopedia, edited by Bonnie Zimmerman, 340-341. New York: Routledge.
- . 2018. *Trans*: A Quick and Quirky Account of Gender Variability*. Oakland: University of California Press.
- Hall, Stuart. 1973. "Encoding and Decoding in the Television Discourse." Birmingham: Centre for Contemporary Cultural Studies, University of Birmingham.
- . 2016. Cultural Studies 1983: A Theoretical History. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Halperin, David M. 1997. Saint Foucault: Towards a Gay Hagiography. New York: Oxford University Press.
- . 2012. How to be Gay. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Hamilton, James W. 1978. "Cinematic Neurosis: A Brief Case Report." Journal of the American Academy of Psychoanalysis 6, no. 4: 569-572.
- Hamilton, Paula, and Linda Shopes, eds. 2008. Oral history and Public Memories. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Han, C. Winter. 2015. Geisha of a Different Kind: Race and Sexuality in Gaysian America. New York: New York University Press.
- Handel, Leo A. 1950. Hollywood Looks at Its Audience: A Report of Film Audience Research. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Hanich, Julian. 2014a. "Watching a Film with Others: Towards a Theory of Collective Spectatorship." Screen 55, no. 3 (Autumn): 338-359.
- . 2014b. "Laughter and Collective Awareness: The Cinema Auditorium as Public Space." NECSUS European Journal of Media Studies 3, no. 2: 43-62.
- . 2018. The Audience Effect: On the Collective Cinema Experience. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

- Hanson, Ellis. 1991. "The Undead." Inside/Out: Lesbian Theories, Gay Theories, edited by Diana Fuss, 324–340. New York: Routledge.
- Haraway, Donna. 1992. "The Promises of Monsters: A Regenerative Politics for Inappropriate/d Others." In Cultural Studies, edited by Lawrence Grossberg, Cary Nelson, and Paula Treichler, 295-337. New York: Routledge.
- Harmetz, Aljean. "Quick End of Low-Budget Horror-Film Cycle Seen." The New York Times (New York, NY), October 2, 1980.
- Harrington, Erin. 2018. Women, Monstrosity and Horror Film: Gynaehorror. London: Routledge.
- Harris, Cheryl. 1998. "Introduction Theorizing Fandom: Fans, Subculture and Identity." In Theorizing Fandom: Fans, Subculture and Identity, edited by Cheryl Harris and Alison Alexander, 3-8. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press.
- Harris, David F. 2014. The Complete Guide to Writing Questionnaires: How to Get Better Information for Better Decisions. Durham, NC: I&M Press.
- Hauser, Fayette. 2020. The Cockettes: Acid Drag & Sexual Anarchy, 1969-1972. Port Townsend, WA: Process Media.
- Heberle, Renee. 2016. "The Personal is Political." In The Oxford Handbook of Feminist Theory, edited by Lisa Disch and Mary Hawkesworth, 593-609. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Heckert, Jamie. 2010. "Intimacy with Strangers/Intimacy with Self: Queer Experiences of Social Research." In Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research, edited by Kath Browne and Catherine J. Nash, 41-53. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Heller, Meredith. 2020. Queering Drag: Redefining the Discourse of Gender-Bending. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Hendershot, Cyndy. 2001. I Was a Cold War Monster: Horror Films, Eroticism, and the Cold War Imagination. Bowling Green, OH: Bowling Green State University Popular Press.
- Henkin, Bill. 1979. The Rocky Horror Picture Show Book. New York: Hawthorn/Dutton.
- Herman, Judith. 2015. Trauma and Recovery: The Aftermath of Violence—From Domestic Abuse to Political Terror. New York: Basic Books.
- Hewson, Claire. 2017. "Research Design and Tools for Online Research." In The SAGE Handbook of Online Research Methods, 2nd ed., edited by Nigel G. Fielding, Raymond M. Lee, and Grant Blank, 57-75. London: SAGE.

- Hill, Annette. 1997. Shocking Entertainment: Viewer Response to Violent Movies. Luton: University of Luton Press.
- Hillman, Betty Luther. 2011. "The Most Profoundly Revolutionary Act a Homosexual Can Engage In': Drag and the Politics of Gender Presentation in the San Francisco Gay Liberation Movement, 1964-1972." Journal of the History of Sexuality 20, no. 1: 153-181.
- Hills, Matt. 2005. The Pleasures of Horror. London: Continuum.
- . 2008. "Media Fandom, Neoreligiosity and Cult(ural) Studies." In The Cult Film Reader, edited by Ernest Mathijs and Xavier Mendik, 133-148. Berkshire: Open University Press.
- . 2010. "Attending Horror Film Festivals and Conventions: Liveness, Subcultural Capital and 'Flesh-and-Blood Genre Communities.'" In Horror Zone: The Cultural Experience of Contemporary Horror Cinema, edited by Ian Conrich, 87-102. London: I. B. Tauris.
- . 2013. "Fiske's 'Textual Productivity' and Digital Fandom: Web 2.0 Democratization Versus Fan Distinction?" Participations 10, no. 1: 130-153.
- . 2014. "Horror Reception/Audiences." In A Companion to the Horror Film, edited by Harry M. Benshoff, 90-108. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Hodkinson, Paul. 2002. Goth: Identity, Style and Subculture. Oxford: Berg.
- hooks, bell. 1996. Reel to Real: Race, Class and Sex at the Movies. New York: Routledge.
- Horn, Katrin. 2017. Women, Camp, and Popular Culture: Serious Excess. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Horowitz, Katie. 2019. Drag, Interperformance, and the Trouble with Queerness. New York: Routledge.
- Hubner, Laura. 2018. Fairytale and Gothic Horror: Uncanny Transformations in Film. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Hughes, Jessica. 2016. "The Festival Collective: Cult Audiences and Japanese Extreme Cinema." In Making Sense of Cinema: Empirical Studies into Film Spectators and Spectatorship, edited by Carrielynn D. Reinhard and Christopher J. Olson, 37-56. New York: Bloomsbury Academic.
- Humphrey, Daniel. 2014. "Gender and Sexuality Haunt the Horror Film." In A Companion to the Horror Film, edited by Harry M. Benshoff, 38-55. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Humphries, Reynold. 2002. The American Horror Film: An Introduction. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

- Hunt, Nathan. 2003. "The Importance of Trivia: Ownership, Exclusion and Authority in Science Fiction Fandom." In Defining Cult Movies: The Cultural Politics of Oppositional Taste, edited by Mark Jancovich, Antonio Lázaro Reboll, Julian Stringer, and Andy Willis, 185-201. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Isherwood, Christopher. 1999. "From The World in the Evening." In Camp: Queer Aesthetics and the Performing Subject: A Reader, edited by Fabio Cleto, 49-52. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Izod, John, and Joanna Dovalis. 2014. Cinema as Therapy: Grief and Transformational Film. London: Routledge.
- Kuhn, Annette, Daniel Biltereyst, and Philippe Meers. 2017. "Memories of Cinemagoing and Film Experience: An Introduction." Memory Studies 10, no. 1: 3-16.
- Jackman, Michael Connors. 2010. "The Trouble with Fieldwork: Queering Methodologies." In Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research, edited by Kath Browne and Catherine J. Nash, 113-128. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Jacobs, Sue-Ellen. 1996. "Afterword." In Out in the Field: Reflections of Lesbian and Gay Anthropologists, edited by Ellen Lewin and William L. Leap, 287-308. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Jameson, Fredric. 1981. The Political Unconscious: Narrative as a Socially Symbolic Act. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Jancovich, Mark, ed. 2002. Horror, the Film Reader. London: Routledge.
- . 2008. "Cult Fictions: Cult Movies, Subcultural Capital and the Production of Cultural Distinctions." In The Cult Film Reader, edited by Ernest Mathijs and Xavier Mendik, 149-162. Berkshire: Open University Press.
- . 2019. "Introduction." Horror Studies 10, no. 1: 3-6.
- Jancovich, Mark, Antonio Lázaro Reboll, Julian Stringer, and Andy Willis, eds. 2003. Defining Cult Movies: The Cultural Politics of Oppositional Taste. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Janovicek, Nancy. 2015. "Oral History and Ethical Practice after TCPS2." In The Canadian Oral History Reader, edited by Kristina R. Llewellyn, Alexander Freund, and Nolan Reilly, 73-97. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press.
- Jenkins, Henry. 1992. Textual Poachers: Television Fans and Participatory Culture. London: Routledge.

- Jerslev, Anne. 2008. "Semiotics by Instinct: 'Cult Film' as a Signifying Practice Between Film and Audience." In The Cult Film Reader, edited by Ernest Mathijs and Xavier Mendik, 88-99. Berkshire: Open University Press.
- Johnson, E. Patrick. 2019. "Put a Little Honey in My Sweet Tea: Oral History as Quare Performance." In Imagining Queer Methods, edited by Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim, 45-62. New York: New York University Press.
- Jones, Darryl. 2018. Sleeping with the Lights On: The Unsettling Story of Horror. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Jones, Matthew. 2018. "Living Cinema Memories: Restaging the Past at the Pictures." In Live Cinema: Cultures, Economies, Aesthetics, edited by Sarah Atkinson and Helen W. Kennedy, 185-198. London: Bloomsbury Academic.
- Jones, Matthew J. 2016. "'Enough of Being Basely Tearful': 'Glitter and Be Gay' and the Camp Politics of Queer Resistance." Journal of the Society for American Music 10: 422-445.
- Jones, Stacy Holman, and Tony E. Adams. 2010. "Autoethnography is a Queer Method." In Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research, edited by Kath Browne and Catherine J. Nash, 195-214. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Kaplan, E. Ann. 2001. "Melodrama, Cinema and Trauma." Screen 42, no. 2: 201-205.
- Kelly, Casey Ryan. 2016. "Camp Horror and the Gendered Politics of Screen Violence: Subverting the Monstrous-Feminine in Teeth (2007)." Women's Studies in Communication 39, no. 1: 86-106. DOI: 10.1080/07491409.2015.1126776.
- King, Andrew, and Ann Cronin. 2010. "Queer Methods and Queer Practices: Re-examining the Identities of Older Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual Adults." In Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research, edited by Kath Browne and Catherine J. Nash, 85-96. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Kjeldsen, Jens E. 2018. "Rhetorical Audience Studies and Reception of Rhetoric." In Rhetorical Audience Studies and Reception of Rhetoric: Exploring Audiences Empirically, edited by Jens E. Kjeldsen, 1-42. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Klesse, Christian. 2006. "Polyamory and its 'Others': Contesting the Terms of Non-Monogamy." Sexualities 9, no. 5: 565-583.
- Kristeva, Julia. 1982. Powers of Horror: An Essay on Abjection. Translated by Leon S. Roudiez. New York: Columbia University Press.
- LaCapra, Dominick. 2014. Writing History, Writing Trauma. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

- Lagapa, Jason. 2010. "Parading the Undead: Camp, Horror and Reincarnation in the Poetry of Frank O'Hara and John Yau." Journal of Modern Literature 33, no. 2: 92-113.
- Latham, Rob. 1998. "Phallic Mothers and Monster Queers." Science Fiction Studies 25, no. 1: 87-101.
- Laurie, Charles, and Eric Jensen. 2016. Doing Real Research: A Practical Guide to Social Research. London: SAGE.
- Leeder, Murray. 2018. Horror Film: A Critical Introduction. New York: Bloomsbury Academic.
- Levin, Nina Jackson, Shanna K. Kattari, Emily K. Piellusch, and Erica Watson. 2020. "'We Just Take Care of Each Other': Navigating 'Chosen Family' in the Context of Health, Illness, and the Mutual Provision of Care amongst Queer and Transgender Young Adults." International Journal of Environmental Research and Public Health 17, no. 19 (7346): 1-20. <https://doi.org/10.3390/ijerph17197346>.
- Levitt, Lauren. 2017. "Batman and the Aesthetics of Camp." In Sontag and the Camp Aesthetic: Advancing New Perspectives, edited by Bruce E. Drushel and Brian M. Peters, 171-188. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.
- Levitt, Linda. 2018. "Nostalgia and Placemaking at Los Angeles' Outdoor Movies." In Live Cinema: Cultures, Economies, Aesthetics, edited by Sarah Atkinson and Helen W. Kennedy, 21-32. London: Bloomsbury Academic.
- Lewin, Ellen, and William L. Leap. 1996. "Introduction." In Out in the Field: Reflections of Lesbian and Gay Anthropologists, edited by Ellen Lewin and William L. Leap, 1-28. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Lewis, Lisa A., ed. 1992. The Adoring Audience: Fan Culture and Popular Media. London: Routledge.
- Lincoln, Yvonna S., and Egon G. Guba. 1985. Naturalistic Inquiry. London: SAGE.
- Lloyd, Moya. 2007. Judith Butler: From Norms to Politics. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Lorde, Audre. 1983. "There Is No Hierarchy of Oppressions." Interracial Books for Children Bulletin: Homophobia and Education 14, no. 3 & 4: 9.
- Lorde, Audre. 2020. Sister Outsider. New York: Penguin Classics.
- Love, Heather. 2019. "'How the Other Half Thinks': An Introduction to the Volume." In Imagining Queer Methods, edited by Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim, 28-44. New York: New York University Press.

- Lowenstein, Adam. 2005. Shocking Representation: Historical Trauma, National Cinema, and the Modern Horror Film. New York: Columbia University Press.
- . 2016. "A Reintroduction to the American Horror Film." In American Film History: Selected Readings, 1960 to the Present, edited by Cynthia Lucia, Roy Grundmann, and Art Simon, 259-274. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Luckhurst, Roger. 2008. The Trauma Question. London: Routledge.
- Luders, Joseph E. 2016. "Feminist Mobilization and the Politics of Rights." In The Consequences of Social Movements, edited by Lorenzo Bosi, Marco Giugni, and Katrin Uba, 185-214. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Ludlam, Charles. 1992. Ridiculous Theatre: Scourge of Human Folly: The Essays and Opinions of Charles Ludlam. Edited by Steven Samuels. New York: Theatre Communications Group.
- Lynch, Teresa, and Nicole Martins. 2015. "Nothing to Fear? An Analysis of College Students' Fear Experiences With Video Games." Journal of Broadcasting & Electronic Media 59, no. 2: 298-317.
- Lynskey, John. 2020. "Queer Cult Performance: Recreating Rocky Horror in the Twenty-First Century." In New Queer Horror Film and Television, edited by Darren Elliott-Smith and John Edgar Browning, 31-42. Cardiff: University of Wales Press.
- Lytle, Megan C., Travis P. Sherer, and Vincent M. B. Silenzio. 2019. "LGBT Health Beyond North America." In The GLMA Handbook on LGBT Health Volume 2: Health Matters and Global Challenges, edited by Jason S. Schneider, Vincent M. B. Silenzio, and Laura Erickson-Schroth, 223-250. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO.
- Mai, Nadin. 2015. "The Aesthetics of Absence and Duration in the Post-Trauma Cinema of Lav Diaz." PhD thesis, University of Stirling.
<http://hdl.handle.net/1893/22990>.
- Maltby, Richard. 2006. "On the Prospect of Writing Cinema History from Below." TMG Journal for Media History 9, no. 2: 74-96.
<http://doi.org/10.18146/tmg.550>.
- Marchetti, Gina. 2008. "Subcultural Studies and the Film Audience: Rethinking the Film Viewing Context." In The Cult Film Reader, edited by Ernest Mathijs and Xavier Mendik, 403-418. Berkshire: Open University Press.
- Mathijs, Ernest, and Xavier Mendik, eds. 2008. The Cult Film Reader. Berkshire: Open University Press.

- McCulloch, Richard, and Virginia Crisp. 2016. "Watch like a grown up . . . enjoy like a child": Exhibition, Authenticity, and Film Audiences at the Prince Charles Cinema." Participations 13, no. 1: 188-217.
- McElroy, Dolores. 2016. "Camp." In Gender: Sources, Perspectives, and Methodologies, edited by Renée C. Hoogland, 293-310. Farmington Hills, MI: Macmillan Reference USA.
- Meyer, Ilan H., and Patrick A. Wilson. 2009. "Sampling Lesbian, Gay, and Bisexual Populations." Journal of Counseling Psychology 56, no. 1: 23-31.
- Meyer, Moe, ed. 1994. The Politics and Poetics of Camp. London: Routledge.
- Miller, Sam J. 2011. "Assimilation and the Queer Monster." In Horror After 9/11: World of Fear, Cinema of Terror, edited by Aviva Briefel and Sam J. Miller, 220-235. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Mooney, Linda A., Molly Clever, and Marieke Van Willigen. 2021. Understanding Social Problems. 11th ed. Boston, MA: Cengage.
- Moraga, Cherríe, and Gloria Anzaldúa, eds. 2015. This Bridge Called My Back: Writings by Radical Women of Color. 4th ed. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Morrison, Ken. 2006. Marx, Durkheim, Weber: Formations of Modern Social Thought. 2nd ed. London: SAGE.
- Morton, Lisa. 2019. Trick or Treat a History of Halloween. London: Reaktion Books.
- Moser, Robert H. 2008. The Carnavalesque Defunto: Death and the Dead in Modern Brazilian Literature. Athens: Ohio University Press.
- Motion Picture Association. 2020. "Theatrical Home Entertainment Market Environment (THEME) Report: A Comprehensive Analysis and Survey of the Theatrical and Home/Mobile Entertainment Market Environment for 2019." Washington, D.C. Accessed May 3, 2020.
<https://www.mpa-apac.org/wp-content/uploads/2020/03/MPA-THEME-2019.pdf>.
- Mulvey, Laura. 1975. "Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema." Screen 16, no. 3: 6-18.
- Muñoz, José Esteban. 1996. "Ephemera as Evidence: Introductory Notes to Queer Acts." Women & Performance: A Journal of Feminist Theory 8, no. 2: 5-16.
- . 1999. Disidentifications: Queers of Color and the Performance of Politics. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

- . 2009. Cruising Utopia: The Then and There of Queer Futurity. New York: New York University Press.
- Muñoz, Lorena. 2010. "Brown, Queer and Gendered: Queering the Latina/o 'Street-Scapes' in Los Angeles." In Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research, edited by Kath Browne and Catherine J. Nash, 55-68. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Nadal, Kevin Leo Yabut. 2020. Queering Law and Order: LGBTQ Communities and the Criminal Justice System. London: Lexington Books.
- Neale, Steve. 2000. Genre and Hollywood. London: Routledge.
- Nelson, Cary, Paula Treichler, and Lawrence Grossberg. 1992. "Cultural Studies: An Introduction." In Cultural Studies, edited by Lawrence Grossberg, Cary Nelson, and Paula Treichler, 1-16. New York: Routledge.
- Newton, Esther. 1979. Mother Camp: Female Impersonators in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Newton, Michael. 2019. Show People: A History of the Film Star. London: Reaktion Books.
- Ní Fhlainn, Sorcha. 2019. Postmodern Vampires: Film, Fiction, and Popular Culture. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Nielsen. 2014. "Lights, Camera, Action! State of the LGBT Moviegoer." Accessed October 17, 2018.
<https://www.nielsen.com/us/en/insights/report/2014/lights-camera-action-state-of-the-lgbt-moviegoer/#>.
- . 2015. "Proudly Setting Trends: The 2015 LGBT Consumer Report." Accessed October 17, 2018.
<https://www.nielsen.com/us/en/insights/report/2015/proudly-setting-trends-the-2015-lgbt-consumer-report/>.
- . 2020. "LGBTQ+ Gamers are an Untapped Demographic." Accessed October 20, 2020.
<https://www.nielsen.com/us/en/insights/article/2020/lgbtq-gamers-are-an-untapped-demographic/>.
- Nielsen, Elly-Jean. 2016. "Lesbian Camp: An Unearthing." Journal of Lesbian Studies 20, no. 1: 116-135.
- Niles, Richard. 2004. "Wigs, Laughter, and Subversion: Charles Busch and Strategies of Drag Performance." Journal of Homosexuality 46, no. 3-4: 35-53.
- Nowell, Richard. 2011. "'There's More Than One Way to Lose Your Heart': The American Film Industry, Early Teen Slasher Films, and Female Youth." Cinema Journal 51, no. 1: 115-140.

- Nussbaum, Emily. 2019. I Like to Watch: Arguing My Way Through the TV Revolution. New York: Random House.
- Oliver-Hopkins, Olivia. 2017. "I's Got to Get Me Some Education!': Class and the Camp-Horror Nexus in House of 1000 Corpses." In Sontag and the Camp Aesthetic: Advancing New Perspectives, edited by Bruce E. Drushel and Brian M. Peters, 151-168. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.
- Orloff, Alvin. 2019. Disasterama!: Adventures in the Queer Underground, 1977-1997. New York: Three Rooms Press.
- Palmer, Paulina. 2012. The Queer Uncanny: New Perspectives on the Gothic. Cardiff: University of Wales Press.
- Patrick-Weber, Courtney. 2020. The Rhetoric and Medicalization of Pregnancy and Childbirth in Horror Films. London: Lexington Books.
- Paul, William. 1994. Laughing, Screaming: Modern Hollywood Horror and Comedy. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Pellegrini, Ann. 2015. "After Sontag: Future Notes on Camp." In A Companion to Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer Studies, edited by George E. Haggerty and Molly McGarry, 168-193. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Pett, Emma. 2013. "People Who Think Outside The Box': British Audiences and Asian Extreme Films." Cine-Excess e-journal 1 (August). Accessed March 4, 2019.
<http://www.cine-excess.co.uk/british-audiences-and-asian-extreme-films.html>.
- . 2021. Experiencing Cinema: Participatory Film Cultures, Immersive Media and the Experience Economy. New York: Bloomsbury Academic.
- Phillips, Kendall R. 2005. Projected Fears: Horror Films and American Culture. Westport, CT: Praeger.
- Picart, Caroline Joan S., and John Edgar Browning, eds. 2012. Speaking of Monsters: A Teratological Anthology. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Pine, B. Joseph, II, and James H. Gilmore 1998. "Welcome to the Experience Economy." Harvard Business Review 76, no. 4: 97–105.
- Pinedo, Isabel Cristina. 1997. Recreational Terror: Women and the Pleasures of Horror Film Viewing. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- . 2020. "Get Out: Moral Monsters at the Intersection of Racism and the Horror Film." In Final Girls, Feminism and Popular Culture, edited by Katarzyna Paszkiewicz and Stacy Rusnak, 95-114. London: Palgrave Macmillan.

- Piro, Sal. 1990. Creatures of the Night: The Rocky Horror Picture Show Experience. Redford, MI: Stabur Press.
- Portelli, Alessandro. 2003. The Order Has Been Carried Out: History, Memory, and Meaning of a Nazi Massacre in Rome. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Powell, Anna. 2005. Deleuze and Horror Film. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Prawer, S. S. 1980. Caligari's Children: The Film as Tale of Terror. New York: Da Capo Press.
- Radstone, Susannah. 2001. "Trauma and Screen Studies: Opening the Debate." Screen 42, no. 2: 188-193.
- Ramírez, Horacio N. Roque. 2008. "Memory and Mourning: Living Oral History with Queer Latinos and Latinas in San Francisco." In Oral History and Public Memories, edited by Paula Hamilton and Linda Shopes, 165-186. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Reid, Robin Anne. 2009. "Thrusts in the Dark: Slashers' Queer Practices." Extrapolation 50, no. 3: 463-483.
- Reinhard, Carrielynn D., and Christopher J. Olson, eds. 2016. Making Sense of Cinema: Empirical Studies into Film Spectators and Spectatorship. New York: Bloomsbury Academic.
- Reisner, Sari L., and Jaclyn MW Hughto. 2019. "Comparing the Health of Non-Binary and Binary Transgender Adults in a Statewide Non-Probability Sample." PLOS ONE 14, no. 8: e0221583.
<https://doi.org/10.1371/journal.pone.0221583>.
- Rich, Adrienne. 1980. "Compulsory Heterosexuality and Lesbian Existence." Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society 5, no. 4 (Summer): 631-660.
- Rich, B. Ruby B. 2013. New Queer Cinema: The Director's Cut. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Ritchie, Donald A. 2003. Doing Oral History: A Practical Guide. Second Edition. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Rivera, David P., and Kevin L. Nadal. 2019. "The Intersection of Queer Theory and Empirical Methods." In Imagining Queer Methods, edited by Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim, 191-206. New York: New York University Press.
- Robinson, Zandria F., and Marcus Anthony Hunter. 2019. "Measurement, Interrupted: Queer Possibilities for Social Scientific Methods." In Imagining Queer Methods, edited by Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim, 163-190. New York: New York University Press.

- Robson, Colin, and Kieran McCartan. 2016. Real World Research: A Resource for Users of Social Research Methods in Applied Settings. 4th ed. Chichester: Wiley.
- Rogers, Jillian C. 2021. Resonant Recoveries: French Music and Trauma Between the World Wars. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Rooke, Alison. 2010. "Queer in the Field: On Emotions, Temporality and Performativity in Ethnography." In Queer Methods and Methodologies: Intersecting Queer Theories and Social Science Research, edited by Kath Browne and Catherine J. Nash, 25-39. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Root, Maria P. P. 1992. "Reconstructing the Impact of Trauma on Personality." In Personality and Psychopathology: Feminist Reappraisals, edited by Laura S. Brown and Mary Ballou, 229-266. New York: Guilford Press.
- Ross, Andrew. 2008. "Uses of Camp." In The Cult Film Reader, edited by Ernest Mathijs and Xavier Mendik, 53-66. Berkshire: Open University Press.
- . 2014. No Respect: Intellectuals and Popular Culture. London: Routledge.
- Ross, Karen, ed. 2012. The Handbook of Gender, Sex and Media. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Round, Julia. 2019. Gothic for Girls: Misty and British Comics. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi.
- Royle, Nicholas. 2003. The Uncanny. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Rubin, Herbert J., and Irene S. Rubin. 2012. Qualitative Interviewing: The Art of Hearing Data. 3rd ed. Los Angeles: SAGE.
- Russo, Julie Levin. 2014. "Textual Orientation: Queer Female Fandom Online." In The Routledge Companion to Media and Gender, edited by Cynthia Carter, Linda Steiner, and Lisa McLaughlin, 450-460. London: Routledge.
- Russo, Vito. 1987. The Celluloid Closet: Homosexuality in the Movies. Rev. edition. New York: Harper & Row.
- Rutherford, Anne. 2013. "Film, Trauma and the Enunciative Present." In Traumatic Affect, edited by Meera Atkinson and Michael Richardson, 80-103. Newcastle upon Tyne: Cambridge Scholars.
- Said, Edward. 2003. Orientalism. London: Penguin Books.
- Saleh, Amany, and Krishna Bista. 2017. "Examining Factors Impacting Online Survey Response Rates in Educational Research: Perceptions of Graduate Students." Online Submission 13, no. 2: 63-74.
- Sandvoss, Cornel. 2005. Fans: The Mirror of Consumption. Cambridge: Polity.

- Scahill, Andrew. 2015. The Revolting Child in Horror Cinema: Youth Rebellion and Queer Spectatorship. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Scales, Adam Christopher. 2015. "Logging into Horror's Closet: Gay Fans, the Horror Film and Online Culture." PhD thesis, University of East Anglia. <https://ueaeprints.uea.ac.uk/id/eprint/59454>.
- Schäfer, Mirko Tobias. 2011. Bastard Culture!: How User Participation Transforms Cultural Production. Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press.
- Scheff, Thomas J., and Don D. Bushnell. 1984. "A Theory of Catharsis." Journal of Research in Personality 18, no. 2: 238-264.
- Scheibel, Will. 2017. American Stranger: Modernisms, Hollywood, and the Cinema of Nicholas Ray. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Schlesinger, Philip, R. Emerson Dobash, Russell P. Dobash, and C. Kay Weaver. Women Viewing Violence. London: BFI.
- Schoonover, Karl, and Rosalind Galt. 2016. Queer Cinema in the World. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Schottmiller, Carl. 2018. "A Drag Primer: Situating RuPaul's Drag Race Within Academic Drag Studies." Presentation at the Popular Culture Association/American Culture Association National Conference, Indianapolis, IN, March 29.
- Scott, D. Travers. 2006. "Growing Up in Horror." In From Boys to Men: Gay Men Write about Growing Up, edited by Ted Gidonse and Rob Williams, 243-249. New York: Carroll & Graf.
- Scott, Suzanne. 2019. Fake Geek Girls: Fandom, Gender, and the Convergence Culture Industry. New York: New York University Press.
- Scrivner, Coltan, John A. Johnson, Jens Kjeldgaard-Christiansen, and Mathias Clasen. 2021. "Pandemic Practice: Horror Fans and Morbidly Curious Individuals Are More Psychologically Resilient During the COVID-19 Pandemic." Personality and Individual Differences 168: 110397. <https://doi.org/10.1016/j.paid.2020.110397>.
- Sedgwick, Eve Kosofsky. 1990. Epistemology of the Closet. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Shaviro, Steven. 1993. The Cinematic Body. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Sher, Ben Raphael. 2015. "Fraught Pleasures: Domestic Trauma and Cinephilia in American Culture." PhD diss., University of California, Los Angeles. <https://escholarship.org/uc/item/3kn4p9v2>.

- Skakov, Nariman. 2012. The Cinema of Tarkovsky: Labyrinths of Space and Time. London: I.B. Tauris.
- Skal, David J. 1993. The Monster Show: A Cultural History of Horror. New York: Penguin Group.
- . 2016. Halloween: The History of America's Darkest Holiday. Mineola, NY: Dover.
- Slagle, R. Anthony. 2003. "Queer Criticism and Sexual Normativity The Case of Pee-wee Herman." In Queer Theory and Communication: From Disciplining Queers to Queering the Discipline(s), edited by Gust A. Yep, Karen E. Lovaas, and John P. Elia, 129-146. Binghamton, NY: Harrington Park Press.
- Sloan, Luke, and Anabel Quan-Haase, eds. 2017. The SAGE Handbook of Social Media Research Methods. London: SAGE.
- Smith, Rommi, and Jenni Molloy. 2019. "The Map Where We Meet and Other Queer-Quare Stories." In Imagining Queer Methods, edited by Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim, 207-229. New York: New York University Press.
- Smith, Stacy L., Marc Choueiti, Katherine Pieper, Ariana Case, and Angel Choi. 2018. "Inequality in 1100 Popular Films: Examining Portrayals of Gender, Race/Ethnicity, LGBT and Disability from 2007 to 2017." Annenberg Inclusion Initiative.
<http://assets.uscannenberg.org/docs/inequality-in-1100-popular-films.pdf>.
- Sontag, Susan. 2008 [1964]. "Notes on 'Camp'." In The Cult Film Reader, edited by Ernest Mathijs and Xavier Mendik, 41-52. Berkshire: Open University Press.
- Spines, Christine. 2009. "Horror Films . . . and the Women Who Love Them!" Entertainment Weekly, no.1058 (July 31st): 30-33.
- Staiger, Janet. 1992. Interpreting Films: Studies in the Historical Reception of American Cinema. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- . 2000. Perverse Spectators: The Practices of Film Reception. New York: New York University Press.
- . 2005. Media Reception Studies. New York: New York University Press.
- Stam, Robert. 1989. Subversive Pleasures: Bakhtin, Cultural Criticism, and Film. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- . 2000. Film Theory: An Introduction. Malden, MA: Blackwell.
- Stark, Ian. 2021. "Response: 'You Dropped Your Butter' — Laughing the Pain Away: The Cathartic Value of Relief Humor in Health Communication." In Cases on Applied and Therapeutic Humor, edited by Stephanie Kelly and Michael K. Cundall, 3-10. Hershey, PA: IGI Global.

- Stokes, DaShanne. 2020. "The LGBT Medical and Political Crisis in the Wake of COVID-19." In Social Problems in the Age of COVID-19, Volume 1: US Perspectives, edited by Glenn W. Muschert, Kristen M. Budd, Michelle Christian, David C. Lane, and Jason A. Smith, 81-90. Bristol: Bristol University Press.
- Stokes, Melvyn, and Richard Maltby, eds. 1999. Identifying Hollywood's Audiences: Cultural Identity and the Movies. London: BFI.
- Stryker, Susan. 1994. "My Words to Victor Frankenstein Above the Village of Chamounix: Performing Transgender Rage." GLQ 1, no. 3: 237-254.
- . 2017. Transgender History, Second Edition: The Roots of Today's Revolution. New York: Seal Press.
- . 2019. "More Words About 'My Words to Victor Frankenstein'." GLQ 25, no. 1: 39-44.
- Tamborini, Ron. 1996. "A Model of Empathy and Emotional Reactions to Horror." In Horror Films: Current Research on Audience Preferences and Reactions, 103-123. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.
- Tamborini, Ron, and James Stiff. 1987. "Predictors of Horror Film Attendance and Appeal: An Analysis of the Audience for Frightening Films." Communication Research 14, no. 4: 415-436.
- Tamborini, Ron, and Kristen Salomonson. 1996. "Horror's Effect on Social Perceptions and Behaviors." In Horror Films: Current Research on Audience Preferences and Reactions, edited by James B. Weaver and Ron Tamborini, 179-197. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.
- Taylor, Jodie. 2012. Playing it Queer: Popular Music, Identity and Queer World-Making. Bern: Peter Lang.
- Taylor, Leila. 2019. Darkly: Black History and America's Gothic Soul. London: Repeater Books.
- Tharp, Julie. 1991. "The Transvestite as Monster. Gender Horror in The Silence of the Lambs and Psycho." Journal of Popular Film and Television 19, no. 3: 106-113.
- Thornton, Sarah. 1995. Club Cultures: Music, Media, and Subcultural Capital. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Tudor, Andrew. 1989. Monsters and Mad Scientists: A Cultural History of the Horror Movie. Oxford: Basil Blackwell.
- . 1997. "Why Horror? The Peculiar Pleasures of a Popular Genre." Cultural Studies 11, no. 3: 443-463.

- . 2003. "Genre." In Film Genre Reader III, edited by Barry Keith Grant, 3-11. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Tulloch, John, and Henry Jenkins. 1995. Science Fiction Audiences: Watching Star Trek and Doctor Who. London: Routledge.
- Turley, Jeffrey M., and Andre P. Derdeyn. 1990. "Case Study: Use of a Horror Film in Psychotherapy." Journal of the American Academy of Child & Adolescent Psychiatry 29, no. 6: 942-945.
- Twitchell, James B. 1985. Dreadful Pleasures: An Anatomy of Modern Horror. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Van Iquity, Sister Dana. "A Linda Blair Affair to Remember." San Francisco Bay Times (San Francisco, CA), June 27, 1996.
- Veeder, William. 1998. "The Nurture of the Gothic, or How Can a Text Be Both Popular and Subversive?" In American Gothic: New Interventions in a National Narrative, edited by Robert K. Martin and Eric Savoy, 20-39. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.
- Vehovar, Vasja, and Katja Lozar Manfreda. 2017. "Overview: Online Surveys." In The SAGE Handbook of Online Research Methods, 2nd ed., edited by Nigel G. Fielding, Raymond M. Lee, and Grant Blank, 143-161. London: SAGE.
- Vehovar, Vasja, Vera Toepoel, and Stephanie Steinmetz. 2016. "Non-Probability Sampling." In The SAGE Handbook of Survey Methodology, edited by Christof Wolf, Dominique Joye, Tom W. Smith, and Yang-chih Fu, 329-345. London: SAGE.
- Vittadini, Nicoletta, Andra Siibak, Irena Carpentier Reifová, and Helena Bilandzic. 2014. "Generations and Media: The Social Construction of Generational Identity and Differences." In Audience Transformations: Shifting Audience Positions in Late Modernity, edited by Nico Carpentier, Kim Christian Schrøder, and Lawrie Hallett, 65-81. London: Routledge.
- Vivar, Rosana. 2018. "Never Seen a Shot Like that Before! Playfulness and Participatory Audiences in San Sebastian Horror and Fantasy Film Festival." In Live Cinema: Cultures, Economies, Aesthetics, edited by Sarah Atkinson and Helen W. Kennedy, 117-132. London: Bloomsbury Academic.
- Vosper, Amy Jane. 2013. "Film, Fear and the Female: An Empirical Study of the Female Horror Spectator." Unpublished master's thesis, Carleton University. <https://doi.org/10.22215/etd/2013-09929>.
- Waldron, Darren. 2016. "Transnational Investments: Aging in Les Invisibles (Sébastien Lifshitz, 2012) and Its Reception." In Making Sense of Cinema: Empirical Studies into Film Spectators and Spectatorship, edited by Carrielynn D. Reinhard and Christopher J. Olson, 57-76. New York: Bloomsbury Academic.

- Walker, Janet. 2005. Trauma Cinema: Documenting Incest and the Holocaust. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Waller, Gregory A., ed. 1987. American Horrors: Essays on the Modern American Horror Film. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Ward, Jane. 2019. "Dyke Methods: A Meditation on Queer Studies and the Gay Men Who Hate It." In Imagining Queer Methods, edited by Amin Ghaziani and Matt Brim, 259-276. New York: New York University Press.
- Warner, Michael, ed. 1993. Fear of a Queer Planet: Queer Politics and Social Theory. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Watson, Elena M. 1991. Television Horror Movie Hosts: 68 Vampires, Mad Scientists and Other Denizens of the Late-Night Airwaves Examined and Interviewed. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.
- Weaver, James B. 1991. "Are 'Slasher' Horror Films Sexually Violent? A Content Analysis." Journal of Broadcasting and Electronic Media 35, no. 3: 385-392.
- Weaver, James B., and Ron Tamborini, eds. 1996. Horror Films: Current Research on Audience Preferences and Reactions. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.
- Weiss, Andrea. 1993. Vampires and Violets: Lesbians in Film. New York: Penguin Books.
- Wells, Paul. 2007. The Horror Genre: from Beelzebub to Blair Witch. London: Wallflower Press.
- Westengard, Laura. 2019. Gothic Queer Culture: Marginalized Communities and the Ghosts of Insidious. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Westrum, Ronald. 1975. "A Note on Monsters." The Journal of Popular Culture 8, no. 4: 862-870.
- Whatling, Clare. 1997. Screen Dreams: Fantasising Lesbians in Film. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- White, Patricia. 1999. Uninvited: Classical Hollywood Cinema and Lesbian Representability. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Wilcox, Melissa M. 2021. Queer Religiosities: An Introduction to Queer and Transgender Studies in Religion. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Wilkinson, Catherine, and Samantha Wilkinson. 2017. "Doing It Write: Representation and Responsibility in Writing Up Participatory Research Involving Young People." Social Inclusion 5, no. 3: 219-227.

- Williams Institute: UCLA School of Law. 2020. "LGBT Demographic Data Interactive." Los Angeles, CA. Accessed July 31, 2020.
<https://williamsinstitute.law.ucla.edu/publications/adult-lgbt-pop-us/>.
- Williams, Linda. 1991. "Film Bodies: Gender, Genre, and Excess." Film Quarterly 44, no. 4: 2-13.
- . 1995. Viewing Positions: Ways of Seeing Film. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- . 2001. "When Women Look: A Sequel." Senses of Cinema. Accessed September 13, 2019.
http://sensesofcinema.com/2001/freuds-worst-nightmares-psychoanalyses-and-the-horror-film/horror\_women/.
- . 2002. "When the Woman Looks." In Horror, the Film Reader, edited by Mark Jancovich, 61-66. London: Routledge.
- Williams, Walter L. 1996. "Introduction." In Out in the Field: Reflections of Lesbian and Gay Anthropologists, edited by Ellen Lewin and William L. Leap, 70-85. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- . 2012. "Being Gay and Doing Fieldwork." In Ethnographic Fieldwork: An Anthropological Reader, edited by Antonius C.G.M. Robben and Jeffrey A. Sluka, 114-123. Second Edition. Chichester: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Winter, Jay. 1998. Sites of Memory, Sites of Mourning: The Great War in European Cultural History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Wolf, Mark J.P., ed. 2018. The Routledge Companion to Imaginary Worlds. New York: Taylor & Francis.
- Wood, Robin. 1984. "An Introduction to the American Horror Film." In Planks of Reason: Essays on the Horror Film, edited by Barry Keith Grant, 164-200. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press.
- . 1985. "Responsibilities of a Gay Film Critic." In Movies and Methods, Volume II, edited by Bill Nichols, 649-660. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- . 2002. Hitchcock's Films Revisited. Revised Edition. New York: Columbia University Press.
- . 2003. Hollywood from Vietnam to Reagan . . . and Beyond. Expanded and Revised Edition. New York: Columbia University Press.
- . 2018. Robin Wood on the Horror Film: Collected Essays and Reviews. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.
- Worland, Rick. 2007. The Horror Film: An Introduction. Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.

- Yep, Gust A. 2003. "The Violence of Heteronormativity in Communication Studies: Notes on Injury, Healing, and Queer World-making." Journal of Homosexuality 45, no. 2-4: 11-59.
- Yep, Gust A., Karen Lovaas, and John P. Elia. 2003. "Reflections on Queer Theory: Disparate Points of View." In Queer Theory and Communication: From Disciplining Queers to Queering the Discipline(s), edited by Gust A. Yep, Karen Lovaas, and John P. Elia, 335-338. Binghamton, NY: Harrington Park Press.
- Yow, Valerie Raleigh. 2005. Recording Oral History: A Guide for the Humanities and Social Sciences. 2nd ed. Walnut Creek, CA: AltaMira Press.
- Ytre-Arne, Brita. 2011. "Women's Magazines and Their Readers: The Relationship Between Textual Features and Practices of Reading." European Journal of Cultural Studies 14, no. 2. (April): 213- 228.
- Zillmann, Dolf, and James B. Weaver. 1996. "Gender-Socialization Theory of Reactions to Horror." In Horror Films: Current Research on Audience Preferences and Reactions, edited by James B. Weaver and Ron Tamborini, 81-102. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.
- Zillmann, Dolf, and Rhonda Gibson. 1996. "Evolution of the Horror Genre." In Horror Films: Current Research on Audience Preferences and Reactions, edited by James B. Weaver and Ron Tamborini, 15-31. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum.
- Zimmerman, Bonnie. 1996. "Daughters of Darkness: The Lesbian Vampire on Film." In The Dread of Difference: Gender and the Horror Film, edited by Barry Keith Grant, 379-387. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- . 2012. "Camp." In Lesbian Histories and Cultures: An Encyclopedia, edited by Bonnie Zimmerman, 141-142. New York: Routledge.

Filmography<sup>1</sup>

The Addams Family. 1991. Directed by Barry Sonnenfeld. USA: Paramount Pictures.

Addams Family Values. 1993. Directed by Barry Sonnenfeld. USA: Paramount Pictures.

Alien. 1979. Directed by Ridley Scott. USA/UK: Brandywine Productions.

All About Evil. 2010. Directed by Joshua Grannell. USA: Backlash Films.

The Babadook. 2014. Directed by Jennifer Kent. Australia: Screen Australia.

The Bad Seed. 1956. Directed by Mervyn LeRoy. USA: Warner Bros.

Beetlejuice. 1988. Directed by Tim Burton. USA: The Geffen Company.

The Birds. 1963. Directed by Alfred Hitchcock. USA: Universal Pictures.

Bit. 2019. Directed by Brad Michael Elmore. USA: Provocator.

Bluebeard. 1944. Directed by Edgar G. Ulmer. USA: Producers Releasing Corporation (PRC).

Bram Stoker's Dracula. 1992. Directed by Francis Ford Coppola. USA: American Zoetrope.

The Bride of Frankenstein (original title: Bride of Frankenstein). 1935. Directed by James Whale. USA: Universal Pictures.

The Brothers Grimm. 2005. Directed by Terry Gilliam. USA/Czech Republic/UK: Dimension Films.

The Cabin in the Woods. 2011. Directed by Drew Goddard. USA: Lionsgate.

Candyman. 1992. Directed by Bernard Rose. USA: Propaganda Films.

Candyman. 2021. Directed by Nia DaCosta. USA: Monkeypaw Productions.

Carrie. 1976. Directed by Brian De Palma. USA: United Artists.

The Cat and the Canary. 1927. Directed by Paul Leni. USA: Universal Pictures.

Children of the Corn. 1984. Directed by Fritz Kiersch. USA: New World Pictures.

The Conjuring. 2013. Directed by James Wan. USA: New Line Cinema.

---

<sup>1</sup> This filmography lists the films I have included in this study, as pertinent to a topic or mentioned by research participants, and should in no way be understood as being a complete filmic representation of queer preferences in the horror genre.

The Craft. 1996. Directed by Andrew Fleming. USA: Columbia Pictures.

Cujo. 1983. Directed by Lewis Teague. USA: Sunn Classic Pictures.

Curse of the Cat People. 1944. Directed by Gunther von Fritsch and Robert Wise. USA: RKO Radio Pictures.

Daughters of Darkness. 1971. Directed by Harry Kümel. Belgium: Showking Films.

Dead Alive (original title: Braindead). 1992. Directed by Peter Jackson. New Zealand: WingNut Films.

Death Becomes Her. 1992. Directed by Robert Zemeckis. USA: Universal Pictures.

The Descent. 2005. Directed by Neil Marshall. UK: Celador Films.

Die! Die! My Darling! (original title: Fanatic). 1965. Directed by Silvio Narizzano. UK: Hammer Film Productions.

Dr. Jekyll and Sister Hyde. 1971. Directed by Roy Ward Baker. UK: Hammer Film Productions.

Dracula. 1931. Directed by Tod Browning. USA: Universal Pictures.

Elvira: Mistress of the Dark. 1988. Directed by James Signorelli. USA: New World Pictures.

The Evil Dead. 1981. Directed by Sam Raimi. USA: New Line Cinema.

Evil Dead II. 1987. Directed by Sam Raimi. USA: Rosebud Releasing Corporation.

The Exorcist. 1973. Directed by William Friedkin. USA: Warner Bros.

Exorcist II: The Heretic. 1977. Directed by John Boorman. USA: Warner Bros.

Faster, Pussycat! Kill! Kill! 1965. Directed by Russ Meyer. USA: RM Films International.

Female Trouble. 1974. Directed by John Waters. USA: Dreamland.

The Fog. 1980. Directed by John Carpenter. USA: Debra Hill Productions.

Frankenstein. 1931. Directed by James Whale. USA: Universal Pictures.

Freaky. 2020. Directed by Christopher Landon. USA: Blumhouse Productions.

Friday the 13th. 1980. Directed by Sean S. Cunningham. USA: Georgetown Productions Inc.

The Gay Bed and Breakfast of Terror. 2007. Directed by Jaymes Thompson. USA: MoDean Pictures.

Get Out. 2017. Directed by Jordan Peele. USA: Blumhouse Productions.

Good Manners (original title: As Boas Maneiras). 2017. Directed by Juliana Rojas and Marco Dutra. Brazil/France: Good Fortune Films.

Grindhouse. 2003. Directed by Joshua Grannell. USA: Backlash Films.

Halloween. 1978. Directed by John Carpenter. USA: Compass International Pictures.

Halloween II. 1981. Directed by Rick Rosenthal. USA: Universal Pictures.

The Haunting. 1963. Directed by Robert Wise. UK: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

Heathers. 1989. Directed by Michael Lehmann. USA: New World Pictures.

Hell Night. 1981. Directed by Tom DeSimone. USA: Compass International Pictures.

Hello Mary Lou: Prom Night II. 1987. Directed by Bruce Pittman. Canada: Simcom Limited.

Hellraiser. 1987. Directed by Clive Barker. UK: New World Pictures.

Hereditary. 2018. Directed by Ari Aster. USA: A24.

Hocus Pocus. 1993. Directed by Kenny Ortega. USA: Walt Disney Pictures.

Homicidal. 1961. Directed by William Castle. USA: William Castle Productions.

House of 1000 Corpses. 2003. Directed by Rob Zombie. USA: Spectacle Entertainment Group.

I Spit on Your Grave (original title: Day of the Woman). 1978. Directed by Meir Zarchi. USA: Jerry Gross Organization.

The Innocents. 1961. Directed by Jack Clayton. UK: 20th Century Fox.

Interview with the Vampire. 1994. Directed by Neil Jordan. USA: The Geffen Film Company.

It. 2017. Directed by Andy Muschietti. USA: New Line Cinema.

It: Chapter Two. 2019. Directed by Andy Muschietti. USA: New Line Cinema.

It Follows. 2014. Directed by David Robert Mitchell. USA: Northern Lights Films.

Jennifer's Body. 2009. Directed by Karyn Kusama. USA: Fox Atomic.

Knife+Heart (original title: Un couteau dans le cœur). 2018. Directed by Yann Gonzalez. France: CG Cinéma.

Lady in a Cage. 1964. Directed by Walter Grauman. USA: AEC.

The Last House on the Left. 1972. Directed by Wes Craven. USA: Sean S. Cunningham Films.

The Lure (original title: Córki dancingu). 2015. Directed by Agnieszka Smoczyńska. Poland: Wytwórnia Filmów Dokumentalnych i Fabularnych (WFDiF).

The Masque of the Red Death. 1964. Directed by Roger Corman. UK/USA: Alta Vista Productions.

Midsommar. 2019. Directed by Ari Aster. USA/Sweden: A24.

Mommie Dearest. 1981. Directed by Frank Perry. USA: Paramount Pictures.

Night of the Demons. 1988. Directed by Kevin S. Tenney. USA: Blue Rider Pictures.

Night of the Living Dead. 1968. Directed by George A. Romero. USA: Continental Distributing.

A Nightmare on Castro Street. 2002. Directed by Joshua Grannell [Peaches Christ]. USA: Backlash Films.

A Nightmare on Elm Street. 1984. Directed by Wes Craven. USA: New Line Cinema.

A Nightmare on Elm Street 2: Freddy's Revenge. 1985. Directed by Jack Sholder. USA: New Line Cinema.

Paris Is Burning. 1990. Directed by Jennie Livingston. USA: Off White Productions.

The Perfection. 2018. Directed by Richard Shepard. USA: Miramax.

Pink Flamingos. 1972. Directed by John Waters. USA: Dreamland.

Poltergeist. 1982. Directed by Tobe Hooper. USA: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

Portrait of a Lady on Fire (original title: Portrait de la jeune fille en feu). 2019. Directed by Céline Sciamma. France: Lilies Films.

Prom Night. 1980. Directed by Paul Lynch. Canada: Simcom Productions.

Psycho. 1960. Directed by Alfred Hitchcock. USA: Paramount Pictures.

Pumpkinhead. 1988. Directed by Stan Winston. USA: De Laurentiis Entertainment Group (DEG).

Re-Animator. 1985. Directed by Stuart Gordon. USA: Empire Pictures.

Rebecca. 1940. Directed by Alfred Hitchcock. USA: United Artists.

Rift (original title: Rökkur). 2017. Directed by Erlingur Thoroddsen. Iceland: Hero Productions.

The Rocky Horror Picture Show. 1975. Directed by Jim Sharman. UK/USA: 20th Century Fox.

Roller Boogie. 1979. Directed by Mark L. Lester. USA: Compass International.

Rosemary's Baby. 1968. Directed by Roman Polanski. USA: Paramount Pictures.

Scream. 1996. Directed by Wes Craven. USA: Dimension Films.

Scream, Queen! My Nightmare on Elm Street. 2019. Directed by Roman Chimienti and Tyler Jensen. USA: The End Productions.

Season of the Troll. 2001. Directed by Joshua Grannell [Peaches Christ]. USA: Backlash Films.

The Sentinel. 1977. Directed by Michael Winner. USA: Universal Pictures.

The Shining. 1980. Directed by Stanley Kubrick. UK/USA: Warner Bros.

Showgirls. 1995. Directed by Paul Verhoeven. USA/France: Carolco Pictures.

The Silence of the Lambs. 1991. Directed by Jonathan Demme. USA: Orion Pictures.

Sleepaway Camp. 1983. Directed by Robert Hiltzik. USA: American Eagle Films.

Spider Baby. 1967. Directed by Jack Hill. USA: American General Pictures.

Spiral. 2019. Directed by Kurtis David Harder. Canada: Digital Interference Productions.

The Stepford Wives. 1975. Directed by Bryan Forbes. USA: Palomar Pictures International.

Strait-Jacket. 1964. Directed by William Castle. USA: William Castle Productions.

Suspiria. 1977. Directed by Dario Argento. Italy: Produzioni Atlas Consorziate (P.A.C.).

The Texas Chain Saw Massacre. 1974. Directed by Tobe Hooper. USA: Vortex.

Thelma. 2017. Directed by Joachim Trier. Norway: Motlys.

The Thing. 1982. Directed by John Carpenter. USA: Universal Pictures.

The Uninvited. 1944. Directed by Lewis Allen. USA: Paramount Pictures.

Us. 2019. Directed by Jordan Peele. USA: Monkeypaw Productions.

Valley of the Dolls. 1967. Directed by Mark Robson. USA: Red Lion.

What Ever Happened to Baby Jane? 1962. Directed by Robert Aldrich. USA: Seven Arts Productions.

What Keeps You Alive. 2018. Directed by Colin Minihan. Canada: Digital Interference Productions.

Whatever Happened to Peaches Christ? 2004. Directed by Joshua Grannell [Peaches Christ]. USA: Backlash Films.

The Witch. 2015. Directed by Robert Eggers. United States/Canada: A24.

Appendix A

Oral History Narrator Research Forms: Participant Information Sheet and Consent Form

Participant Information Sheet

Drag Me to Hell: Horror Film Meets Queer Spectatorship, Fandom & Performance

1. Invitation to research

I am a postgraduate doctoral researcher investigating the habits and opinions of queer fans of horror film. My research topic is borne out of a drive to better understand my community of horror-loving queers, a vibrant queer fandom culture that exhibits a distinctive engagement with horror film.

I would like to invite you to take part in this research study about queer spectatorship of horror film. Before you decide whether to participate in this recorded interview, you should understand why the research is being done and what it would involve for you. Please take time to read this Participant Information Sheet carefully in your consideration of participating. Ask questions if anything you read is not clear or if you would like more information.

2. Why have I been invited?

You have been invited to participate in a one-on-one interview because you are a member of the LGBTQ+ community and you love horror.

3. Do I have to take part?

It is up to you to decide. We will describe the study and go through the information sheet, which we will give to you. We will then ask you to sign a consent form to show you agreed to take part. You are free to withdraw at any time, without giving a reason.

4. What will I be asked to do?

Your participation in this research project will involve the audio recording of an oral history interview of no more than two hours (per interview sitting), which you can stop at any time. In the one-on-one interview(s), you will be asked questions related to your love of horror and how you experience your queerness in relationship to the horror genre. The goal is to investigate the meaning of horror fandom and experience for all the interview participants because certain emotions, practices, and actions are not quantifiable via an online questionnaire; qualitative interviews are the best option to understand the complex meaning of tastes, habits, opinions, and experiences. I will use these interviews to both underscore the findings of the completed online questionnaire and make new connections between queerness and horror fandom.

Upon the completion of my degree, the audio recordings of any self-identified public figures' interviews (along with their corresponding transcripts) will be securely housed at Manchester Metropolitan University (MMU) and made available for future researchers. Within 30 days of the completion of my degree, the audio files for any self-identified private citizen interviews will be entirely deleted, while the transcripts will be anonymized and then securely housed at Manchester Metropolitan University (MMU) in order to be made available for future researchers. When private citizen transcripts are anonymized, any mention of the private citizen's name, phone, email, or location will be removed. Each interview participant will be required to select on the Consent Form whether they identify as a private citizen or a public figure. A copy of your own transcript(s) can be emailed to you upon request. MMU's main research repository is called "e-space," which is managed by MMU's Library Service. MMU is responsible for complying with General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) whenever personal data is processed. The University has a Data Protection Policy setting out their compliance statement which can be found here: <https://www2.mmu.ac.uk/data-protection/>

5. Are there any risks if I participate?

There is no harm or risk foreseen through your participation in this interview.

6. Are there any advantages if I participate?

Your participation is voluntary and unpaid, and you are able to withdraw from the interview process at any point. By participating, you will help assure that this often invisible or marginalized community (horror-loving queers) will gain a voice in the academic discourse, a visibility that will span both queer and horror scholarship.

7. What will happen with the data I provide?

When you agree to participate in this research, we will collect from you personally-identifiable information.

The Manchester Metropolitan University ('the University') is the Data Controller in respect of this research and any personal data that you provide as a research participant.

The University is registered with the Information Commissioner's Office (ICO), and manages personal data in accordance with the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) and the University's Data Protection Policy.

We collect personal data as part of this research (such as name, telephone numbers or age). As a public authority acting in the public interest we rely upon the 'public task' lawful basis. When we collect special category data (such as medical information or ethnicity) we rely upon the research and archiving purposes in the public interest lawful basis.

Your rights to access, change or move your information are limited, as we need to manage your information in specific ways in order for the research to be reliable and accurate. If you withdraw from the study, we will keep the information about you that we have already obtained.

If your data is shared this will be under the terms of a Research Collaboration Agreement which defines use and agrees confidentiality and information security provisions. It is the University's policy to only publish anonymized data unless you have given your explicit written consent to be identified in the research. The University never sells personal data to third parties.

We will only retain your personal data for as long as is necessary to achieve the research purpose.

As mentioned in section 4, the interviews and transcripts of the public-figure interviews and the anonymized transcripts of the private-citizen interviews will be turned over to MMU and will be made available for future researchers. Upon receipt, MMU is responsible for complying with data protection regulations (GDPR).

I, the thesis author and Researcher/Principal Investigator, will store and analyze the interview data from my personal password- and fingerprint-protected computer. I work from a private and locked office and use password-protected internet access. If I leave the office (such as study trips to MMU), I will employ NordVPN, a personal virtual private network service provider that ensures a strong and reliable encryption (256-bit AES encryption), between my device and a remote server. Once I have submitted all the appropriate data files to MMU, within 30 days of my degree completion, all files will be deleted/removed from my possession, at which point all access to these files will remain with MMU.

For further information about use of your personal data and your data protection rights please see the University's Data Protection Pages (<https://www2.mmu.ac.uk/dataprotection/>).

What will happen to the results of the research study?

Interview participants will not only be quoted in my doctoral thesis, but also, potentially, in other writings, publications, and presentations related to this research project. Your self-selected status as either a public figure or a private citizen will determine whether or not your quote(s) will be attributed to you or remain anonymous. Public figures will be named in the research and private citizens will remain confidential, with only certain identity markers—such as age, race, gender, and sexual orientation—being disclosed if relevant to the discussion and/or analysis.

If you wish to read the PhD dissertation, you may contact me via email at the conclusion of my studies (July 2021).

Who has reviewed this research project?

This project has been reviewed by both my advisors and scrutineers at the Manchester Centre for Gothic Studies MMU and has been received ethical approval from the Research Ethics and Governance committee.

Who do I contact if I have concerns about this study or I wish to complain?

If you have questions concerning your rights as a participant, you may contact the Faculty Head of Ethics and Governance at Manchester Metropolitan University or the researcher, Heather O. Petrocelli.

Heather O. Petrocelli
Principal Investigator
Postgraduate Researcher, Manchester Centre for Gothic Studies MMU
heather.petrocelli@stu.mmu.ac.uk | +1 (503) 200 0537

Dr Linnie Blake
Director of Studies
Head of the Manchester Centre for Gothic Studies
l.blake@stu.mmu.ac.uk | +44 (0)161 247 1738

Prof Susan Baines
Faculty Head of Ethics and Governance Manchester Metropolitan University
artsandhumanitiesethics@mmu.ac.uk

If you have any concerns regarding the personal data collected from you, our Data Protection Officer can be contacted using the legal@mmu.ac.uk e-mail address, by calling 0161 247 3331 or in writing to: Data Protection Officer, Legal Services, All Saints Building, Manchester Metropolitan University, Manchester, M15 6BH. You also have a right to lodge a complaint in respect of the processing of your personal data with the Information Commissioner's Office as the supervisory authority. Please see: <https://ico.org.uk/global/contact-us/>

THANK YOU FOR CONSIDERING PARTICIPATING IN THIS PROJECT

Participant Identification Number:

CONSENT FORM

Title of Project:

Drag Me to Hell: Horror Film Meets Queer Spectatorship, Fandom & Performance

Name of Researcher:

Heather O. Petrocelli

Please initial box

1. I confirm that I have read the information sheet dated _____ (version _____) for the above study. I have had the opportunity to consider the information, ask questions and have had these answered satisfactorily.
2. I understand that my participation is voluntary and that I am free to withdraw at any time without giving any reason.
3. I understand that the information collected about me will be used to support other research in the future, and may be shared anonymously with other researchers.
4. I understand that the interview will be recorded (audio only).
5. I understand that my audio recorded interview(s) will be transcribed, and the transcript(s) will be made freely available online to future researchers on Manchester Metropolitan University's research repository e-space (<http://e-space.mmu.ac.uk/>). At any time, you may contact the Research Support Librarians at rsl@mmu.ac.uk if you wish to withdraw permission for your transcript(s) to be available on e-space.
6. I understand that my interview's audio file(s) will be archived at MMU as part of this research project and will be made freely available online to future researchers on Manchester Metropolitan University's research repository e-space (<http://e-space.mmu.ac.uk/>). At any time, you may contact the Research Support Librarians at rsl@mmu.ac.uk if you wish to withdraw permission for your audio recording to be available on e-space.
7. I agree to take part in the above study.

8. I understand that my below initials will designate whether I will be classified as a private citizen or a public figure for this research (and any associated publications and presentations related to this research).

a. I wish to be identified as a private citizen and thus understand that my name will remain confidential and will not be disclosed in any publications associated with this research. I understand that only certain identity markers—such as age, gender, race, and/or sexual orientation—will be disclosed if relevant to the discussion and/or analysis.

b. I wish to identify as a public figure and agree to be named in the thesis and thus any associated research publications. I understand that my identity markers—such as age, gender identity, race, and/or sexual orientation—will also be disclosed and may be known to readers in conjunction with my name.

_____
Name of Participant

_____
Date

_____
Signature

_____
Name of Researcher

_____
Date

_____
Signature

Appendix B

Online Survey Design<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> While this appendix accurately presents the survey's questions, the printout format does not represent how the online survey was interactively presented to potential respondents when it was live—April 1, 2019 through August 1, 2019—via Online Surveys.

Queer Fans of Horror Film

---

Page 1: INTRODUCTION

You must be at least 18 years old to participate

Thank you so much for taking the time to complete this questionnaire. The goal of this research project is to understand the habits, tastes, opinions, and experiences of queer fans of horror. Aggregate results and selected quotes from this questionnaire will remain anonymous when included in my doctoral dissertation at Manchester Metropolitan University's Centre for Gothic Studies. This questionnaire should take about 20 minutes to complete.

Your participation is voluntary. You do not have to answer any question you do not wish to, and you can withdraw at any time before you submit the completed questionnaire. There are no anticipated risks or discomforts associated with your participation and we have taken multiple steps to protect your data privacy and confidentiality, including hosting the questionnaire on Online Survey, which adheres to General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) regulations, provides requisite strengthened data security, and does not use cookies when participants complete the questionnaire. The questionnaire, moreover, will not collect names, phone numbers, or email addresses and all raw data will be securely deleted upon the completion of this research project.

The completion of this survey implies your informed consent to participate.

Page 2: ABOUT YOU + HORROR

1. Overall, do you consider yourself a fan of any type of horror film?

- Yes
- No

1.a. How long have you thought of yourself as a horror fan?

- As far back as I can remember
- The last decade or so
- The last few years
- I'm a new fan to horror
- I don't consider myself a horror fan

2. How old were you when you first started watching horror films?

3. Overall, do you consider yourself to be knowledgeable about horror film?

- Yes
- No

3.a. How would you describe your horror film knowledge?

- Very knowledgeable
- Knowledgeable

- Somewhat knowledgeable
- Not at all knowledgeable

4. What started your interest in the horror genre? select all that apply

- |   |   |  |
|---|---|--|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Literature       | <input type="checkbox"/> Comic books            | <input type="checkbox"/> Film or movies        |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Television shows | <input type="checkbox"/> Internet or web series | <input type="checkbox"/> Gaming or video games |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Board games      | <input type="checkbox"/> Haunted attractions    | <input type="checkbox"/> Other                 |

4.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

5. Do your close friends know that you are a fan of horror films?

- Yes
- No

6. Do members of your family (of origin) know that you are a fan of horror films?

- Yes
- No

6.a. While you were growing up, did your family (of origin) have an opinion about your interest in horror films?

- Yes
- No

6.a.i. Which of the following most accurately reflects how your family (of origin) reacted to your horror interests?

- Encouraged you
- Stayed neutral
- Expressed reservations
- Discouraged you

7. Are some of your close friends and/or partner(s) also interested in horror films?

- Yes
- No

8. How comfortable are you with graphic physical violence in horror films?

- Very comfortable
- Comfortable
- Somewhat comfortable
- Not at all comfortable

9. How comfortable are you with with graphic sexual violence in horror films?

- Very comfortable
- Comfortable

- Somewhat comfortable
- Not at all comfortable

10. How comfortable are you with gore in horror films?

- Very comfortable
- Comfortable
- Somewhat comfortable
- Not at all comfortable

11. How comfortable are you with tension and/or suspense in horror films?

- Very comfortable
- Comfortable
- Somewhat comfortable
- Not at all comfortable

12. Overall, in horror films do you tend to identify with:

- The "Victim"
- The "Monster"
- Both
- Neither
- Other

12.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

Page 3: HORROR HABITS

13. How much of a horror fan do you consider yourself to be?

Please use the below scale:

0 = not a fan

5 = massive fan.

Please don't select more than 1 answer(s) per row.

	0	1	2	3	4	5
Horror Fandom	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>

14. Have you ever watched, on television or streaming, a horror host (such as Elvira, Mistress of the Dark or Joe Bob Briggs) introduce a horror film?

- Yes
- No

15. Have you ever seen a drag queen introduce a horror film in a movie theatre that includes a short drag (pre)show before the film?

- Yes
- No

15.a. Would you like to see a drag queen introduce a horror film in a movie theatre?

- Yes
- No

15.b. What did you like about seeing a drag queen introduce a horror film in a movie theatre?

16. Have you ever attended a live musical adaptation of a horror film such as Carrie, Evil Dead, Re-Animator, etc.?

- Yes
- No

16.a. Would you like to see a live musical adaptation of a horror film such as Carrie, Evil Dead, Re-Animator, etc.?

- Yes
- No

17. Do you watch narrative films (in the theatre or at home) that are explicitly categorized as LGBTQ+?

- Yes
- No

18. Do you watch documentary films (in the theatre or at home) that are explicitly categorized as LGBTQ+?

- Yes

No

19. Do you regularly listen to podcasts?

Yes

No

19.a. Do you listen to podcasts about horror films?

Yes

No

19.a.i. From the following list, please select the horror movie podcasts to which you regularly listen. select all that apply

Attack of the Queerwolf!

Bloody Good Horror

Cocktail Party Massacre

Dead and Lovely

Dead for Filth with Michael Varrati

Dead Meat

Gaylords of Darkness

Final Girls Horrorcast

FriGay the 13th

Halloweeners

Horror 101

Horror Movie Club

Horror Movie Podcast

Horror Movie Survival Guide

Horror Pod Class

Horror Queers

It's Only a Podcast

Night of the Living Podcast

Nightmare On Film Street

Post Mortem

Queer Horror Cult

Saturday the 14th

Saw Something Scary

Say You Love Satan

ScreamQueenz

She Kills

Shock Waves

Switchblade Sisters

Test Pattern

The Evolution of Horror

The Faculty of Horror

The Film Flamers

The Horror Show

- The Last Podcast On the Left       Werewolf Ambulance       Witch Finger
- Women in Caskets       XOXO Horror       Other

19.a.i.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

20. Have you ever attended a horror convention, such as Fantastic Fest, Fangoria's Weekend of Horrors, Crypticon, etc.?

- Yes
- No

20.a. Overall, how queer friendly do you consider horror conventions to be?

- Very queer friendly
- Queer friendly
- Somewhat queer friendly
- Not at all queer friendly

20.a.i. In what ways would you say the conventions were 'queer friendly'?

21. Do you follow any horror accounts on social media?

- Yes
- No

22. Do you participate in any fan forums, fan websites, online blogs, or Facebook groups about horror?

- Yes, I actively participate (read and comment)
- Yes, I passively participate (read only)
- No, I don't participate

23. Do you collect horror films in any formats such as Blu-ray, DVD, LaserDisc, VHS, or any digital form?

- Yes
- No

24. Do you purchase horror memorabilia and/or collectibles, such as enamel pins, t-shirts, figures, original one sheets, posters, lobby cards, Funko, etc.?

- Yes
- No

25. In the most recent 12 months, approximately how often did you go to the movies or a movie theatre?

- More than once a week
- Once a week
- A few times a month

- Once a month
- Every few months
- Twice a year
- Once a year
- Never

26. In the most recent 12 months, how often do you watch horror films in each of the following ways? select one frequency per format

	More than once a week	Once a week	A few times a month	Once a month	Every few months	Twice a year	Once a year	Never
At the cinema or movie theatre	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
Streaming on television	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
Streaming on computer, laptop, tablet, or phone	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
Cable or network television	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
DVD or Blu-ray on television	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
VHS or LaserDisc on television	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
DVD or Blu-ray on computer	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
Games console	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>

27. With whom do you generally watch horror films? select all that apply

- Alone
- With a friend
- With a partner
- With parent(s) and/or sibling(s)
- With an all or mostly LGBTQ+ group
- With a mixed LGBTQ+ & heterosexual group
- With an all or mostly heterosexual group
- Other

27.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

28. For the below formats in which you view films, please indicate with whom you usually watch horror films: select one per format

	Alone	With a friend	With a partner	With an all or mostly LGBTQ+ group	With a mixed LGBTQ+ & heterosexual group	With an all or mostly heterosexual group	Not applicable
At the cinema or movie theatre	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
Streaming on television	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>

Streaming on computer, laptop, tablet, or phone	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
Cable or network television	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
DVD or Blu-ray on television	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
VHS or LaserDisc on television	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
DVD or Blu-ray on computer	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
Games console	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>

29. Over time, have you changed with whom you watch horror films?

Yes
 No

29.a. In what ways have you changed with whom you watch horror films?

30. In the most recent 12 months, how frequently do you watch television shows (including web television) that are in the horror genre?

- More than once a week
- Once a week
- A few times a month
- Once a month
- Every few months
- A few times a year
- Once a year
- Never

30.a. Do you regularly binge new horror shows and/or new seasons of existing horror series?

- Yes
- No

31. Which of the following horror film 'extras' do you enjoy? select all that apply

- |   |   |   |
|---|---|---|
| <input type="checkbox"/> 'Making of...' documentaries | <input type="checkbox"/> Interviews with the cast | <input type="checkbox"/> Interview with the director                |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Interviews with the crew     | <input type="checkbox"/> Audio commentaries       | <input type="checkbox"/> Special / visual / digital effects footage |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Deleted scenes               | <input type="checkbox"/> Director's cut           | <input type="checkbox"/> Producer's cut                             |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Behind-the-scenes footage    | <input type="checkbox"/> Soundtrack               | <input type="checkbox"/> Red Carpet and/or premiere coverage        |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Easter eggs                  | <input type="checkbox"/> Outtakes / bloopers      | <input type="checkbox"/> Other                                      |

31.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

32. Has the frequency with which you watch horror films increased, decreased or stayed the same since you first started watching horror films?

- Increased
- Stayed the same
- Decreased

33. Do you read horror and/or Gothic fiction?

- Yes
- No

33.a. Based on the most recent 12 months, how often do you read horror and/or Gothic fiction?

- Frequently
- Somewhat frequently
- Not very frequently
- Rarely

34. Do you read horror magazines?

- Yes
- No

34.a. Based on the most recent 12 months, how often do you read horror magazines?

- Frequently
- Somewhat frequently
- Not very frequently
- Rarely

34.a.i. Which horror magazine(s) do you frequently read?

Page 4: HORROR TASTES

35. Does the presence of a strong female character affect your enjoyment of a horror film?

- Yes
- No

35.a. In what ways?

36. Does the presence of a queer character affect your enjoyment of a horror film?

- Yes
- No

36.a. In what ways?

37. For each of the following categories and/or subgenres of horror films, select how much you like or dislike each one.

Love	Like	Neither Like nor Dislike	Dislike	Hate	Don't know
------	------	-----------------------------	---------	------	---------------

Silent Horror	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Universal Horror	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Hammer Horror	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Roger Corman/American International Pictures (AIP)	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Slasher	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Vampire	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Zombie/Living Dead	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Werewolf	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Supernatural/Occult/Ghost	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Witchcraft	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Monster Movies	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Serial Killer	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Psychological	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Rape Revenge	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Possession	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Body Horror	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Sci-Fi Horror	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Horror Comedy or Parody	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Home Invasion & Survival	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Cyber/Internet Horror	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Found Footage/POV	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Extreme Horror	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>

38. Select the 3 horror film categories/subgenres that you tend to find the scariest:

Please select no more than 3 answer(s).

Silent Horror

Universal Horror

Hammer Horror

<input type="checkbox"/> Roger Corman/American International Pictures (AIP)	<input type="checkbox"/> Slasher	<input type="checkbox"/> Vampire
<input type="checkbox"/> Zombie/Living Dead	<input type="checkbox"/> Werewolf	<input type="checkbox"/> Supernatural/Occult/Ghost
<input type="checkbox"/> Witchcraft	<input type="checkbox"/> Monster Movies	<input type="checkbox"/> Serial Killer
<input type="checkbox"/> Psychological	<input type="checkbox"/> Rape Revenge	<input type="checkbox"/> Possession
<input type="checkbox"/> Body Horror	<input type="checkbox"/> Sci-Fi Horror	<input type="checkbox"/> Horror Comedy or Parody
<input type="checkbox"/> Home Invasion & Survival	<input type="checkbox"/> Cyber/Internet Horror	<input type="checkbox"/> Found Footage/POV
<input type="checkbox"/> Extreme Horror

39. Select up to 5 of your most loved horror film categories/subgenres:

Please select no more than 5 answer(s).

<input type="checkbox"/> Silent Horror	<input type="checkbox"/> Universal Horror	<input type="checkbox"/> Hammer Horror
<input type="checkbox"/> Roger Corman/American International Pictures (AIP)	<input type="checkbox"/> Slasher	<input type="checkbox"/> Vampire
<input type="checkbox"/> Zombie/Living Dead	<input type="checkbox"/> Werewolf	<input type="checkbox"/> Supernatural/Occult/Ghost
<input type="checkbox"/> Witchcraft	<input type="checkbox"/> Monster Movies	<input type="checkbox"/> Serial Killer
<input type="checkbox"/> Psychological	<input type="checkbox"/> Rape Revenge	<input type="checkbox"/> Possession
<input type="checkbox"/> Body Horror	<input type="checkbox"/> Sci-Fi Horror	<input type="checkbox"/> Horror Comedy or Parody
<input type="checkbox"/> Home Invasion & Survival	<input type="checkbox"/> Cyber/Internet Horror	<input type="checkbox"/> Found Footage/POV
<input type="checkbox"/> Extreme Horror

40. Select up to 5 of your most hated horror film categories/subgenres:

Please select no more than 5 answer(s).

- |   |  |  |
|---|--|--|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Silent Horror                                      | <input type="checkbox"/> Universal Horror      | <input type="checkbox"/> Hammer Horror             |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Roger Corman/American International Pictures (AIP) | <input type="checkbox"/> Slasher               | <input type="checkbox"/> Vampire                   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Zombie/Living Dead                                 | <input type="checkbox"/> Werewolf              | <input type="checkbox"/> Supernatural/Occult/Ghost |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Witchcraft   | <input type="checkbox"/> Monster Movies        | <input type="checkbox"/> Serial Killer             |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Psychological                                      | <input type="checkbox"/> Rape Revenge          | <input type="checkbox"/> Possession                |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Body Horror  | <input type="checkbox"/> Sci-Fi Horror         | <input type="checkbox"/> Horror Comedy or Parody   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Home Invasion & Survival                           | <input type="checkbox"/> Cyber/Internet Horror | <input type="checkbox"/> Found Footage/POV         |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Extreme Horror                                     |  |  |

41. Select up to 10 of your favorite horror franchises:

Please select no more than 10 answer(s).

- |  |  |   |
|--|--|---|
| <input type="checkbox"/> A Nightmare on Elm Street | <input type="checkbox"/> Alien               | <input type="checkbox"/> Amityville               |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Blade                     | <input type="checkbox"/> Blair Witch         | <input type="checkbox"/> Candyman                 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Children of the Corn      | <input type="checkbox"/> Child's Play        | <input type="checkbox"/> Cube                     |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Final Destination         | <input type="checkbox"/> Friday the 13th     | <input type="checkbox"/> Fright Night             |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Ginger Snaps              | <input type="checkbox"/> Godzilla            | <input type="checkbox"/> Halloween                |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Hellraiser                | <input type="checkbox"/> Howling             | <input type="checkbox"/> Insidious                |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Jaws                      | <input type="checkbox"/> King Kong           | <input type="checkbox"/> Lake Placid              |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Leprechaun                | <input type="checkbox"/> Night of the Demons | <input type="checkbox"/> Night of the Living Dead |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Paranormal Activity       | <input type="checkbox"/> Phantasm            | <input type="checkbox"/> Piranha                  |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Poltergeist               | <input type="checkbox"/> Predator            | <input type="checkbox"/> Psycho                   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Pumpkinhead               | <input type="checkbox"/> Puppet Master       | <input type="checkbox"/> Re-Animator              |

<input type="checkbox"/> [REC]	<input type="checkbox"/> Resident Evil	<input type="checkbox"/> Return of the Living Dead
<input type="checkbox"/> Saw	<input type="checkbox"/> Scary Movie	<input type="checkbox"/> Scream
<input type="checkbox"/> Silent Night, Deadly Night	<input type="checkbox"/> Sinister	<input type="checkbox"/> Sleepaway Camp
<input type="checkbox"/> Slumber Party Massacre	<input type="checkbox"/> The Conjuring	<input type="checkbox"/> The Evil Dead
<input type="checkbox"/> The Exorcist	<input type="checkbox"/> The Omen	<input type="checkbox"/> The Purge
<input type="checkbox"/> The Texas Chainsaw Massacre	<input type="checkbox"/> Underworld	<input type="checkbox"/> Wrong Turn
<input type="checkbox"/> Other

41.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

42. In no particular order, list up to 5 of your favorite horror films.

Favorite Horror Films
#1	<input style="width: 100%; height: 30px;" type="text"/>
#2	<input style="width: 100%; height: 30px;" type="text"/>
#3	<input style="width: 100%; height: 30px;" type="text"/>
#4	<input style="width: 100%; height: 30px;" type="text"/>
#5	<input style="width: 100%; height: 30px;" type="text"/>

43. What do you consider to be the scariest horror film that you have seen?

---

44. Do you watch horror films from different countries around the world?

Yes

No

44.a. From which of the following countries do you watch horror films? select all that apply

Australia

Canada

China (incl. Hong Kong)

France

Germany

India

Iran

Italy

Japan

Mexico

New Zealand

Nigeria

Russia

South Korea

Spain

Sweden

Thailand

Turkey

United Kingdom

United States

Other

44.a.i. If you selected Other, please specify:

Page 5: HORROR OPINIONS

45. As a member of the LGBTQ+ community, do you feel that you have a different reaction to horror films as compared with heterosexual viewers?

- Yes
- No

45.a. In what ways?

46. Do you feel that being queer influences your taste in horror films?

- Yes
- No

46.a. In what ways?

47. Do you feel that queers are under-represented in the horror genre?

- Yes
- No

48. How much do you agree or disagree with the following statements about horror films? select one per statement

	Strongly Agree	Agree	Neither Agree or Disagree	Disagree	Strongly Disagree	Don't Know
Horror films are cathartic	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Horror films help me face my fears	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Horror films help me work through trauma	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Horror films relieve the tedium of my everyday life	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Horror films let me use my imagination	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Horror films make me laugh	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
Horror films are more frightening than they used to be	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
21st-century horror films are too violent and gory	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I enjoy being frightened by horror films	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I like horror films with a queer protagonist or character	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I most enjoy watching horror films with queer audiences	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I enjoy "camp-y" horror films	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>

There is too much heterosexual sex in horror films	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I watch horror films as a form of escapism	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I like horror films with lots of suspense and/or tension	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I enjoy “jump scares” or being startled while watching horror films	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I like watching people being attacked or killed in horror films	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I am comfortable viewing explicitly sexual violence, such as rape	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I prefer horror films in which “the monster” is hidden or unseen	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I often relate to “the monster” in horror films	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I watch horror films for the special/practical/visual effects and make-up	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I empathize with or relate to the heroine/hero/final girl	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
The gorier the horror film, the more I enjoy it	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>
I have to shut my eyes/hide my face during horror films	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>	<input type="radio"/>

Page 6: OTHER INTERESTS

49. Which of the following social media sites do you regularly visit? select all that apply

- |                                    |                                    |                                   |
|------------------------------------|------------------------------------|-----------------------------------|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Instagram | <input type="checkbox"/> Facebook  | <input type="checkbox"/> Snapchat |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Twitter   | <input type="checkbox"/> Pinterest | <input type="checkbox"/> Tumblr   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Reddit    | <input type="checkbox"/> None      | <input type="checkbox"/> Other    |

49.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

50. Have you ever been to any of the following? select all that apply

- Drive-in theatre
- A luxury theatre
- An open-air, outdoor or rooftop screening
- A live immersive movie experience
- A movie screening featuring a live talk or Q&A with cast, director, or writers
- A film festival or special showcase
- None
- Other

50.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

51. Which activities do you regularly enjoy? select all that apply

- |  |   |   |
|--|---|---|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Shopping                          | <input type="checkbox"/> Exercising                     | <input type="checkbox"/> Travelling                   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Watching and/or streaming TV      | <input type="checkbox"/> Reading books                  | <input type="checkbox"/> Visiting museums & galleries |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Volunteering                      | <input type="checkbox"/> Playing video games            | <input type="checkbox"/> Cooking and/or baking        |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Making art and/or crafting        | <input type="checkbox"/> Watching and/or playing sports | <input type="checkbox"/> Coding and/or technology     |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Playing and/or listening to music | <input type="checkbox"/> Going to see live theatre      | <input type="checkbox"/> Eating out                   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Hiking and/or camping             | <input type="checkbox"/> Going to drag shows            | <input type="checkbox"/> Going to concerts            |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Clubbing or dancing               | <input type="checkbox"/> Gardening                      | <input type="checkbox"/> Other                        |

51.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

52. Generally, which genres of film do you watch? select all that apply

- |  |   |                                      |
|--|---|--------------------------------------|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Action              | <input type="checkbox"/> Adult            | <input type="checkbox"/> Adventure   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Animation/Anime     | <input type="checkbox"/> Biography/Biopic | <input type="checkbox"/> Comedy      |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Crime/Detective/Spy | <input type="checkbox"/> Cult             | <input type="checkbox"/> Documentary |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Drama               | <input type="checkbox"/> Family           | <input type="checkbox"/> Fantasy     |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Film Noir           | <input type="checkbox"/> Foreign/World    | <input type="checkbox"/> Historical  |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Horror              | <input type="checkbox"/> Musical          | <input type="checkbox"/> Romance     |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Sci-Fi              | <input type="checkbox"/> Sport            | <input type="checkbox"/> Superhero   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Thriller/Suspense   | <input type="checkbox"/> War              | <input type="checkbox"/> Western     |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Other               |   |                                      |

52.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

53. Generally, which types of books do you read? select all that apply

- |   |                                     |  |
|---|-------------------------------------|--|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Autobiography        | <input type="checkbox"/> Biography  | <input type="checkbox"/> Classics        |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Crime                | <input type="checkbox"/> Fantasy    | <input type="checkbox"/> Graphic Novel   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> History              | <input type="checkbox"/> Horror     | <input type="checkbox"/> LGBTQ+          |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Contemporary Fiction | <input type="checkbox"/> Memoir     | <input type="checkbox"/> Poetry          |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Romance              | <input type="checkbox"/> Science    | <input type="checkbox"/> Science Fiction |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Travel               | <input type="checkbox"/> True Crime | <input type="checkbox"/> Thrillers       |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Young Adult          | <input type="checkbox"/> Other      |  |

53.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

54. Generally, what types of television programs do you watch and/or stream? select all that apply

- |  |  |                                    |
|--|--|------------------------------------|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Action          | <input type="checkbox"/> Adult         | <input type="checkbox"/> Adventure |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Animation/Anime | <input type="checkbox"/> Biography     | <input type="checkbox"/> Comedy    |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Costume Drama   | <input type="checkbox"/> True Crime    | <input type="checkbox"/> Detective |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Documentary     | <input type="checkbox"/> Drama         | <input type="checkbox"/> Family    |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Fantasy         | <input type="checkbox"/> Game Show     | <input type="checkbox"/> History   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Home & Garden   | <input type="checkbox"/> Horror        | <input type="checkbox"/> LGBTQ+    |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Music           | <input type="checkbox"/> Musical       | <input type="checkbox"/> Mystery   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> News            | <input type="checkbox"/> Reality Shows | <input type="checkbox"/> Romance   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Sci-Fi          | <input type="checkbox"/> Sitcom        | <input type="checkbox"/> Sketch    |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Soap Operas     | <input type="checkbox"/> Sport         | <input type="checkbox"/> Superhero |

- |                                       |                                    |                                   |
|---------------------------------------|------------------------------------|-----------------------------------|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Supernatural | <input type="checkbox"/> Talk Show | <input type="checkbox"/> Thriller |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Travel       | <input type="checkbox"/> War       | <input type="checkbox"/> Western  |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Wildlife     | <input type="checkbox"/> Other     |                                   |

54.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

55. Which of the following subjects interest you? select all that apply

- |  |   |   |
|--|---|---|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Astrology                     | <input type="checkbox"/> Tarot                                    | <input type="checkbox"/> Eastern religions                                  |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Pagan religions               | <input type="checkbox"/> Western religions                        | <input type="checkbox"/> Witchcraft   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Seances                       | <input type="checkbox"/> Halloween / Samhain /Day of the Dead | <input type="checkbox"/> Haunted attractions /Haunts(entertainment) |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Haunted places (reallife) | <input type="checkbox"/> Ufology                                  | <input type="checkbox"/> True Crime / SerialKillers                     |

56. Have you ever been to a drag show?

- Yes
 No

56.a. Would you like to go to a drag show?

- Yes
 No

57. Have you ever watched RuPaul's Drag Race?

- Yes
- No

57.a. How big of a fan do you consider yourself to be of RuPaul's Drag Race?

- Avid fan
- Devoted fan
- Casual fan

58. Have you ever watched The Boulet Brothers' Dragula?

- Yes
- No

58.a. How big of a fan do you consider yourself to be of The Boulet Brothers' Dragula?

- Avid fan
- Devoted fan
- Casual fan

Page 7: DEMOGRAPHIC INFORMATION

Collecting demographic data for a diverse community can unintentionally leave some persons feeling unrepresented or unseen. With inclusivity as a goal, nearly every question provides an open entry box if the best answer for you has not been provided. The below demographic information is being collected for aggregate data analysis about queer fans of horror film, not for individual examination, and your identifying details will not be connected with your answers.

59. Do you currently live in the United States?

- Yes
- No

59.a. Do you currently live in the United Kingdom, Ireland, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand?

- Yes
- No

59.b. Have you lived in the United States for the majority of your life?

- Yes
- No

60. What is your current age?

61. Which category or categories best describe your Race/Ethnicity? select all that apply

- American Indian or Alaska Native
- Asian or Asian American
- Black or African American
- Latinx
- Middle Eastern or North African
- Multiracial
- Native Hawaiian or other Pacific Islander
- White or Caucasian
- Prefer not to answer
- Other

61.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

62. Please indicate your highest level of education completed:

- Some high school
- High school diploma or GED
- Some college or training
- Trade, technical or vocational training
- Associate's degree
- Bachelor's degree
- Master's degree
- Doctorate and/or other Professional degree
- Other

62.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

63. Please indicate your current sexual orientation: select all that apply

- Gay
- Lesbian
- Queer
- Bisexual
- Pansexual
- Heterosexual
- Polyamorous
- Asexual
- Other

63.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

64. Please indicate your current gender identity: select all that apply

- Cisgender woman
- Cisgender man
- Transgender woman
- Transgender man
- Transsexual
- Genderqueer woman

- Genderqueer man
- Genderqueer person
- Non-Binary person
- Agender
- Other

64.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

65. Please indicate your current relationship status:

- Single
- Dating
- In a monogamous relationship
- In a non-monogamous relationship
- In a monogamous domestic partnership
- In a non-monogamous domestic partnership
- In a monogamous marriage
- In a non-monogamous marriage
- In a polyamorous relationship
- Other

65.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

66. Please indicate the make-up of your current friend group(s): select all that apply

- Mostly LGBTQ+
- Mostly heterosexual
- Mixed LGBTQ+ & heterosexual
- Mostly opposite gender to yourself
- Mixed genders
- Other

66.a. If you selected Other, please specify:

Page 8: Final page

Thank you very much for completing this questionnaire. If you feel that you have more to contribute to this project, please feel free to write me at heather.petrocelli@stu.mmu.ac.uk. If you choose to email me, please note that our email exchanges will not be anonymous, but, of course, your questionnaire anonymity will remain in place.

---

Key for selection options

2 - How old were you when you first started watching horror films?

- Under 12 years old
- 12-17 years old
- 18-24 years old
- 25-34 years old
- 35-44 years old
- 45-54 years old
- 55-64 years old
- 65-74 years old
- 75 years or older

60 - What is your current age?

- 18-23 years old
  - 24-29 years old
  - 30-35 years old
  - 36-41 years old
  - 42-47 years old
  - 48-53 years old
  - 54-59 years old
  - 60-65 years old
  - 66+ years old
-

Appendix C

Complete List of the Films Screened at Queer Horror up to June 2021

Complete Queer Horror Film List

Film	Date of screening
Sleepaway Camp (1983)	June 18, 2015
A Nightmare on Elm Street 2: Freddy's Revenge (1985)	August 27, 2015
Shock Treatment (1981)	December 17, 2015
Fright Night (1985)	February 18, 2016
High Tension/Haute Tension (2003)	April 14, 2016
Desperate Living (1977)	June 30, 2016
The Craft (1996)	August 18, 2016
Beetlejuice (1988)	October 13, 2016
Addams Family Values (1993)	November 16, 2016
Queer Horror for the Holidays (horror shorts)	December 23, 2016
Bound (1996)	February 14, 2017
The Slumber Party Massacre (1982)	April 6, 2017
Drop Dead Gorgeous (1999)	June 15, 2017
Death Becomes Her (1992)	August 24 & 26, 2017
Queer Horror Halloween (horror shorts)	October 27, 2017
Batman Returns (1992)	December 14, 2017
Bride of Chucky (1998)	February 14, 2018
Friday the 13th Part VII: The New Blood (1988)	April 13, 2018
Scream (1996)	June 21, 2018
The Final Girls (2015)	August 23, 2018

Halloween: H20 (1998)	October 25, 2018
Candyman (1992)	December 6, 2018
Seed of Chucky (2004)	February 14, 2019
The Stepford Wives (1972)	March 15, 2019
The Silence of the Lambs (1991)	April 11, 2019
Resident Evil (2002)	June 13, 2019
Hello Mary Lou: Prom Night II (1987)	September 5, 2019
Elvira: Mistress of the Dark (1988)	October 31, 2019
The Sentinel (1977)	December 12, 2019
Child's Play 2 (1990)	February 14, 2020
The Lure (2015)	March 20, 2020* (postponed 5th Anniversary celebration)