

Please cite the Published Version

Warrington, Camille , Benchekroun, Rachel, Millar, Hannah, Whittington, Elsie , Bradley, Louise , Elizabeth, Megan, Hamilton, CJ, Howard, Keeley, Poingdestre, Evie and Walker, Kirsche (2024) Participation for protection: New perspectives on the value of young people's involvement in research addressing sexual violence. Childhood. ISSN 0907-5682

DOI: <https://doi.org/10.1177/09075682241269720>

Publisher: SAGE Publications

Version: Accepted Version

Downloaded from: <https://e-space.mmu.ac.uk/635476/>

Usage rights:  In Copyright

Additional Information: This is an author accepted manuscript of an article published in Childhood, by SAGE Publications.

Enquiries:

If you have questions about this document, contact openresearch@mmu.ac.uk. Please include the URL of the record in e-space. If you believe that your, or a third party's rights have been compromised through this document please see our Take Down policy (available from <https://www.mmu.ac.uk/library/using-the-library/policies-and-guidelines>)

Participation for protection: new perspectives on valuing young people's involvement in research addressing sexual violence

Journal:	Childhood
Manuscript ID	CHD-23-0158.R2
Manuscript Type:	Special Issue: Deepening collaborative research: relations of production, contexts and meaning-making
Keywords:	Participation, Child Sexual Abuse, Interpersonal Violence, Ethics, Children's Rights
Abstract:	Within our research to address sexual violence, we have developed an approach supporting collaboration between young people and academic staff called YRAP (Young Researchers Advisory Panel). YRAP exists to support young people's influence in research addressing sexual violence – both in our university and beyond. In this article, current and former YRAP members, as well as current and former academic supporting staff, reflect on our experiences and learning. We also highlight the importance of finding new ways to explain the value and contribution of our work through the development of an infographic and model called Participation as Protection.

SCHOLARONE™
Manuscripts

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

297x173mm (300 x 300 DPI)

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

297x173mm (300 x 300 DPI)

420x297mm (300 x 300 DPI)

Participation for protection: new perspectives on valuing young people's involvement in research addressing sexual violence

Abstract

Within our research to address sexual violence, we have developed an approach supporting collaboration between young people and academic staff called YRAP (Young Researchers Advisory Panel). YRAP exists to support young people's influence in research addressing sexual violence – both in our university and beyond. In this article, current and former YRAP members, as well as current and former academic supporting staff, reflect on our experiences and learning. We also highlight the importance of finding new ways to explain the value and contribution of our work through the development of an infographic and model called Participation as Protection.

Introduction

Rationale and approach

This article shares learning from a collaborative research model with young people addressing sexual violence called the Young Researchers' Advisory Panel (YRAP). We aim to highlight from our experiences, as current and former YRAP members and staff, what we have learnt since the group formed in 2016, acknowledging the challenges which we have faced and how important it is to work through these. The article will also share a significant output from the YRAP: our participation as protection infographic. This output represents our attempt to better understand and explain the value of young people's involvement in sexual violence research, and is part of challenging resistance to the role of young people's participation in this field.

The article was written collaboratively using recorded online conversations that brought together current and former YRAP members and academic staff from the last seven years. In doing so we engage in what might be termed 'multi-generational participatory research' (Fox and Fine, 2015). These conversations were guided by a series of questions such as:

- What has the impact of YRAP been on me?
- What have been the things that we've found hard?

- What have been the things that have worked well?
- What have we achieved?

In some conversations we spent time writing as well as talking before swapping our reflections to discuss (Atkinson et al. 2022). Quotes throughout the article are taken directly from our recorded conversations or reflective writing, and in a few cases are supplemented by relevant excerpts from a related podcast transcript that YRAP members were working on simultaneously. We also worked together to develop a structure for our article – and then volunteered to draft different sections – taking the lead or reviewing. During this process we tried to consider the different skills and perspectives that we brought. For example, it made sense for an academic researcher to collect and share wider literature that put our arguments in context – while existing and former YRAP members led on identifying challenges and achievements. The final draft of our article was edited by academic research staff before whole team review. This article and the dialogue on which it is based was included within a wider ongoing initiative called Learning about the YRAP which was reviewed and approved by University of Bedfordshire’s Institute of Applied Social Research Ethics Panel.

Article overview

The article starts by placing our arguments in context – firstly in relation to wider literature on young people’s participation in relation to sensitive subject matter, and secondly in relation to our own practice. Drawing on the reflections of current and former YRAP team we then present an overview of our working processes and the YRAP’s model - its rationale, history and context. This includes acknowledgement of the flawed and iterative nature of these processes – in keeping with our shared interest in trying to talk about our work more honestly. We use our article to argue the need for longer-term participatory research practices which last beyond project specific boundaries and a need for funding structures which support this. We also highlight the centrality of relationships built on trust, mutual recognition and respect within this work - between academic researchers and young people; and between researchers and their wider institutions and funders.

Finally, we present learning about the need to better articulate the value of young people’s involvement in sexual violence research given long standing barriers and resistance to

1
2
3 children and young people’s participation in this field. This highlights how we see the 4 relationship between children’s rights to protection and participation in the field of sexual
5 violence – sharing a collaboratively developed infographic: Participation as protection.
6
7
8
9

10 Children and youth participation in context

11 Young people’s participation in research

12
13 Over the last two decades evidence shows increasing use of participatory research
14 approaches globally with children and young people, particularly in the fields of health,
15 humanities, education and social studies (Yamaguchi et al., 2023; Brady and Graham, 2019;
16 Templeton et al., 2023). This change to children’s relationship to research reflects longer 17 term changes to how society recognises children’s rights and agency (UNCRC, 1989; James 18 and Prout, 1990; Archard, 2004). Children and young people’s influence within research is 19 demonstrated through a range of models. These include (but are not limited to) examples
20 where children and young people are described as research consultants or advisors (Wright
21 et al., 2020); peer researchers - researching their own communities or peer groups (Cuevas-
22 Parra, 2018), and activist researchers – implementing research to bring about social change
23 (Batsleer et al. 2022). Young people’s involvement also spans different methodologies and 24 methods including implementation of surveys; interviews; focus groups; arts-based 25 methods; participatory action research and ethnography.
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38

39 Participatory research with children and young people mirrors (and has learnt from)
40 international development, critical social pedagogies and welfare approaches which seek to 41 increase the influence of individuals with direct experience of relevant issues in practice and 42 policy development (Chambers, 1994; Freire, 1973; Beresford and Carr, 2012). These bodies
43 of work are notable for challenging systemic injustice - recognising participatory approaches 44 as political endeavours that challenge traditional ways in which knowledge is produced and 45 used to uphold structures of power and authority.
46
47
48
49
50
51
52

53 Young people’s participation in the field of sexual violence research

54 Despite the growth of young people’s participation in research broadly this remains limited
55 in research relating to sexual violence globally (Bovarnick et al. 2018; Whittington, 2019).
56 Reticence to engage young people in research addressing sexual violence is associated with 57 paternalism and perceived high levels of risk engaging individuals deemed ‘highly 58
59
60

1
2
3 vulnerable' (Ibid). The nature of this risk is often broadly defined as relating to either re-
4 traumatised (for those with experience of sexual abuse) and/or vicarious trauma for 5 those exposed to issues for the first time.
6
7

8
9 Furthermore, the necessarily 'loose' nature of participatory research (Chambers, 2004) can 10 sit uncomfortably with research ethics committees who often expect high levels of certainty
11 in the face of particularly 'sensitive' subject matter. In this context, certainty is framed as a
12 means to support preparedness and the anticipation and management of risk. Logistical 13 barriers also prevent more widespread involvement of young people in this research field – 14 reflecting high levels of potential support needs for participants which require additional 15 resourcing or different timescales to what is considered 'normal' for research.
16
17

18 It is important, however, to acknowledge that notable exceptions do exist. Early efforts from 19 campaigning organisations such as Barnardo's and ECPAT International in the UK and 20 elsewhere involved young people in consultative work and campaigning research to address
21 child sexual abuse (Taylor Browne, 2002; Barnardo's SECOS, 2008; Feinstein, and O'Kane, 22 2008). The last decade has also seen increased commitment to children and young people's 23 participation in related academic research (Bovarnick and Cody, 2021; Rabe, 2023).
24
25

26 Our work builds on and learns from these examples and recognises ongoing leadership of 27 Non-Governmental Organisation (NGO) based research in this field (Elphick and Notté, 28 2023). Arguably this also reflects the youth and community work skills base on which so
29 much of this work relies. Supporting Banks et al. (2011)'s argument that participatory 30 research requires strong facilitation skills as well as critical reflection on 31 participant/researcher power relations, rights, and responsibilities – skills which often lie 32 outside those considered foundational for researchers.
33
34

35 The interdependency of protection and participation rights

36 As noted above, attempts to challenge the absence of children and young people's influence 37 in efforts to address sexual violence need to engage with questions of both risk and 38 resourcing – both of which remain central to this article. In addition, we posit that children's 39 rights provide an essential theoretical framework to advocate for children and young 40 people's role at the centre of addressing sexual violence. Specifically, we highlight the 41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 principle of the interdependency of children's rights, challenging the idea that children's 4 participation rights can be superseded by their rights to protection (UNCRC, 1989).

5
6
7 Yet despite widespread acknowledgement of this theoretical relationship (Mitchell et al.,
8 2023) there is strong evidence that in practice it remains poorly understood or 9 operationalised (Lefevre et al., 2019). This appears to be particularly true for young people
10 living in contexts of significant risk or considered highly vulnerable, where risk averse
11 research cultures can mean excluding them from participation in the name of protection
12 (Warrington and Larkin, 2019).

13
14
15 Taken together, this is the backdrop against which the YRAP development and work is set.
16 Our work learns from and responds to this context of both the growing movement to 17 engage children and young people in research, and continued barriers to these approaches
18 in relation to sexual violence. In the following sections we outline the work of the YRAP in 19 further detail and the emergence of the Participation as Protection model.

20 21 22 23 24 25 26 27 28 29 30 31 32 33 34 35 36 37 38 39 40 41 42 43 44 45 46 47 48 49 50 51 52 53 54 55 56 57 58 59 60

Introducing the Young Researchers Advisory Panel

Background and context to YRAP

The Young Researchers Advisory Panel (YRAP) was established in 2016 within the Safer Young Lives Research Centre (SYLRC) at the University of Bedfordshire. The initiative developed out of an established tradition within the centre of trying to embed participatory research practices with children and young people in our applied research programme addressing sexual violence.

Despite the growth of children's participation in research and policy development during this period, both SYLRC researchers and young research participants experienced perceptible resistance to young people undertaking participatory roles to address sexual violence – as written about by YRAP members previously (Hamilton et al., 2019). As a team our attempts to engage young people in research addressing sexual violence often met with anxieties from potential NGO service partners and other researchers. This has been a source of frustration for many of us within the YRAP team and a focus for our advocacy efforts.

We were very uncomfortable with the way that some professionals were labelling young people with personal experience of sexual violence. And they

1
2
3 had this idea and opinion that young people who have lived experience [of the 4 issue] aren't good enough really to contribute and to be involved in
5 participatory work and research.' (YRAP member)
6
7
8

9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Meanwhile, project based participatory research practice within the Safer Young Lives Research Centre continued to demonstrate potential to manage this work safely, and benefits that emerged from it. This learning was mirrored in the UK by participatory practice initiatives led by partners such as AYPH (2013), Barnardo's SECOS (2008) and Abianda (2023).

As this work continued it was increasingly recognised that there would be value in collaboration with young people that went beyond the timeframes and boundaries of specific research projects. Several young people and researchers who collaborated within research projects developed strong and effective working relationships and expressed a desire to sustain these ties. However, without a specific role or project to work on, the nature of these relationships felt poorly defined and hard to support. A desire by research staff to reach out to previous research participants after a project had ended felt ethically problematic, as acknowledged by a former YRAP member:

'Young people [with prior experience of research involvement] wanted to be acknowledged as more than just people the centre would draw upon.'

(Former YRAP member)

Meanwhile, as our centre was increasingly invited to talk to others about participatory research practice in this field, we became aware of our own shortcomings in embedding participation at the organisational level. Subsequently discussions followed between a group of us, including young people involved in our research and academic researchers. This resulted in piloting a new, professional role where young people were not simply called upon to help with an individual research project but could have a more strategic role and collaborate with our centre and those in the wider sector. At this early juncture, support from our organisational management, including commitment to fund a small amount of YRAP members' and academic researchers' time, proved critical – enabling a chance to try out a model and develop further bids.

Defining the YRAP

1
2
3 The YRAP is unsurprisingly a shifting model – necessarily defined and redefined by its
4 evolving membership in response to their priorities and different organisational and funding
5 circumstances which contextualise the work. At the time of writing the group was defined 6 thus:
7
8
9

11 Young Researchers Advisory Panel

12
13 We are a group of young people interested in improving things for young people affected by 14 sexual violence and other forms of abuse. The YRAP support the Safer Young Lives Research
15 Centre by helping to make sure that research about young people is informed by and 16 undertaken with young people, including those with lived experience of the issues being 17 explored.”
18
19 20
21
22

23 Membership of YRAP is a paid and professional role. This aims to reflect the sometimes 24 strategic and advisory nature of the role and the fact that, as YRAP members, at times, we 25 are asked to respond to organisational priorities –alongside engaging in research and 26 influencing priorities of our own.
27
28

29
30
31 Membership requires some experience of accessing relevant welfare or justice services and 32 some prior experience of participation activities in relevant research, campaigns or practice.
33 As YRAP members, we self-identify as sharing a passion to influence change and improve 34 experiences for other young people who may have experienced harm. Many of us draw on 35 personal experiences, particularly where we have not been supported in the way we needed.
36 YRAP members are therefore powerful advocates who critically engage with the systems and 37 issues that affect young people, as well as promote and develop more effective ways of doing
38 participatory practice.
39
40
41
42
43
44
45

46 One critical enabling factor for all our work has been some flexible core funding. This has 47 enabled a relatively consistent staff team; provided security for YRAP contracts and allowed 48 flexibility to support young people’s contributions in contexts when our needs and capacity
49 ebb and flow. We think that making the funding and resource contexts of participatory work
50 visible is vital to discussing if and how such work is possible. Too often children and young 51 people’s participatory work is built or dependent on invisible (and subsequently unfunded)
52 labour – both from young people and adults: reliant on the passion of key individuals but 53 often unsustainable.
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 The YRAP work has also been shaped by its national (England-wide) nature, meaning
4 participants are based across the country, informing how the group meet and collaborate.
5

6
7 Since its inception there have been 15 young YRAP members, aged 16 – 25 years, a few of 8 whom have subsequently moved on to wider research or influencing roles. YRAP academic 9 research staff have also included ‘YRAP alumni’ and the role aspires to support young
10 people’s trajectory into further learning or employment. The work of YRAP is both reactive 11 and proactive (though we recognise that it often leans too much towards the former).
12

13
14 Reactive work involves advising on research design and research topics for UK and 15 international stakeholders both internal and external to the university (including 16 Department of Health and Social Care; Department for Education; the Independent Inquiry
17 into Sexual Abuse; ECPAT International; SVRI and other universities). More proactive work
18 has involved our own professional development; collaborative writing and reflection;
19 knowledge exchange and influencing activities; development of podcasts; delivering training
20 and a peer research project on young people’s transitions from using services into related 21 advisory or professional roles.
22

23
24 Acknowledging our achievements is important, and we are indeed proud of the breadth and 25 depth of YRAP’s influence. However, the focus of this article is different. Rather than 26 considering ‘what’ we have achieved – it focuses more on the whys and how’s of YRAP 27 work: why it is important to involve young people in participatory ways to address sexual 28 violence (be that through research, practice or policy) and how we have supported one 29 another to do this.
30

31 32 33 34 35 36 37 38 39 40 41 42 43 44 45 How we ‘do’ YRAP – the good, the bad and the challenges.

46 The conceptual model Participation as protection which forms a focus for this article was 47 both a product of, and reflection on, our shared experiences of ‘doing YRAP’ together. It was 48 developed to explain and advocate for why young people should be involved in research
49 and related efforts to address sexual violence, but it is also an example of how we have
50 managed to work together to exert influence in the sector. For this reason, before we offer 51 more detail about the model, we attempt to better situate how the work emerged and 52 share more about our practices of ‘doing YRAP’ together. In doing so we seek to avoid 53 glossing over some of the contradictions and inconsistencies of our work.
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 'being honest about some of those challenges and not painting a rosy picture
4 that it's all wonderful when it's not; finding that balance between the two,
5 about being honest, sharing that learning, I think will give people more
6 confidence' (Former YRAP academic supporting staff)
7
8
9

10
11 The quote above, is taken from an early discussion set up to help us develop this article and 12 highlights that a shared priority among YRAP members and academic supporting staff was 13 not to hide the messy realities of 'doing YRAP'. This section attempts to highlight some of 14 these 'messy realities' and is structured into two sections. The first focuses on what we as a
15 team identify as levers and enablers of our participatory practice. Some of these are 16 cornerstones of YRAP while others are more aspirational – key principles that may at times
17 be hard for us to fully uphold. The second section embraces the challenges that the group 18 face and what we recognise as missteps or shortcomings of our work to encourage 19 reflection.
20
21

22 Levers and enablers of our participatory practice:

23
24 When developing this article, a key interest among the group – YRAP members and alumni
25 particularly – was a chance to identify factors that had supported us to work together. Many 26 of our reflections will be familiar to others supporting child and youth participation in 27 research and elsewhere. Though not exhaustive we focus on four overlapping principles 28 with particular relevance in the field of sexual violence and abuse. These are:
29
30

- 31 i) the management and holding of risk,
 - 32 ii) a flexible and responsive model;
 - 33 iii) relational processes; and
 - 34 iv) a reflective learning culture.
- 35
36
37
38
39

40 Management, engagement and holding of risk

41
42 As outlined above, we are aware of risks associated with our work, and indeed have 43 experienced these. For example elements of YRAP group discussions can surface difficult
44 memories – sometimes described as being 'triggered'. At other times, frustrations with 45 confronting shortcomings in practice or policy can leave us heavy with a sense of injustice.
46
47
48
49
50

1
2
3 Questions are also often raised about the 'readiness' of young people to engage in reflective
4 or collective work to address sexual violence - especially when still receiving individual
5 support (Cody et al., 2022). While few would deny the value of assessment and reflection
6 processes with young people before they engage in new activities, as YRAP members and 7 academic supporting staff we question overly simplistic criteria for assessing young people's 8 readiness to participate in research:
9
10
11
12
13

14 '=some professionals that I've encountered just seem to think, "...we're not 15 going to involve you because you're ... still not healed or recovered from it."
16 But then that's some young people's coping mechanisms, to talk about it in 17 such a powerful way ... 'this isn't okay', 'I want to change it', 'I want to use
18 my experience to make sure that nobody else goes through it again'. (YRAP 19 member)
20
21
22
23
24
25

26 These comments provide a timely reminder that participation rights are immutable and 27 apply equally to all (UNCRC, 1989). YRAP has taught us to be expansive and inclusive in our 28 thinking about participation – involving young people in collaborative safety planning to 29 help them identify if YRAP is the right opportunity for them.
30
31
32

33 Yet we all agree that an approach that focuses solely on the risks (however seriously we take 34 them) without considering the potential benefits that exist both alongside and perhaps more
35 crucially within these risks, will not be motivated to manage, hold or overcome them. Instead, 36 what we need is to consider is: 'How [do] you minimise those risks? how do you say okay we 37 know there are barriers, and we know that some things might happen but how do we 38 overcome them and prevent them from happening? ... and how do we get young people
39 involved?' (Former YRAP member).
40
41
42
43
44
45
46

47 When asking young people to engage in these processes, it is vital that we work in trauma-
48 informed ways which seek to minimize distress, and respond quickly and sensitively when 49 difficulties arise. Helpful principles include maximizing choice and control, provision of clear
50 information to manage our expectations about the work and what the role entails, and a co-
51 produced 'group contract' which informs how we work together. In addition, meetings are 52 designed to include fun and grounding activities. One-to-one catch ups between meetings
53 provide opportunities for debriefs and follow up where difficulties may have arisen in group
54 meetings (sometimes without the knowledge of staff). Facilitation of workshops is also 55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 shared; and training opportunities and access to specialist counselling are also provided
4 where required.
5
6

7 Yet the nature of group work and participation means there are limits to what facilitators can
8 control. In choosing to be part of the group we all agree to engage with a level of uncertainty
9 about what will emerge and how this may make us feel. This highlights an ongoing tension
10 between preparedness and the inevitable 'looseness' of participatory work.
11
12
13

14 It is also important to acknowledge that not all risks come from 'within' and that our 15 engagement with external partners brings new risks – particularly in relation to respecting 16 young people's role, their contributions and considering how they are represented and 17 supported to influence change. In past experience, YRAP members have felt their 18 contributions have not been meaningfully used or acknowledged. To mitigate this, we 19 developed a checklist for external partners prompting them to consider their rationale for 20 engaging young people in their research activities, and asking them to think about procedures 21 for meaningful participation, impact, and feedback.
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29

30 In summary, a crucial part of how we work is about how we 'put risk in perspective' (Bovarnick 31 and Cody, 2021). As a YRAP team, we must remind other adults how young people are 32 constantly engaged in reflecting on risks for themselves and others, while also benefiting from 33 support to reflect on these issues and safety plan. One YRAP member notes that 'participation 34 goes hand in hand with safeguarding':
35
36
37
38

39
40 'Young people who have lived experience, working in research can experience
41 reminders of traumas. It is important to safeguard and prioritise young people
42 but I do think it's important to challenge the idea that participation is always 43 risky...I believe we should consider at what point the young person is in their
44 recovery, go over boundaries, consent, making plans to mitigate risks etc....It
45 may not be constructive for them to participate but from my personal
46 experience it is the opposite. It helped me save myself.' (YRAP member) 47
48
49
50
51
52

53 A flexible and responsive model

54
55 The YRAP role is necessarily flexible and responsive to individual needs. A commitment to 56 including diverse perspectives and members who are traditionally marginalized from 57 undertaking research means how we work needs to be individually tailored. Enabling YRAP
58
59
60

1
2
3 work to be different for different members can and does take time and resources to adapt
4 but ultimately, it aims to make everyone feel included and valued.

5
6
7 'There was always someone there making sure that my identity, that my
8 journey, my experience, was protected in the way that I felt comfortable
9 with.' (Former YRAP member)

10
11
12
13 'Recognise that every young person is different, experiences things differently.
14 There is not one solution for all. You have to work with the young person and 15 connect with them to be able to help them. Give them time and freedom.'

16
17
18 (Quote from YRAP / Research in Practice podcast, 2023)

19
20
21 A practical example might be mitigating the intensity of travelling or group interaction by 22 offering and developing alternative ways for individuals to feed into a collective task and 23 rejoin group work later. Ensuring that as YRAP members we have choice and control in what 24 we do supports increased and ongoing participation from members. As one YRAP member 25 explains: 'I know in regard to safeguarding some things must be decided by professionals but 26 it's the small things, asking the young people where they feel safe to have their meeting, if 27 they want to bring someone etc.' (YRAP member)

28 29 30 31 32 33 34 Relational processes

35
36 Relationships, unsurprisingly, are a core component that underpins all we do and supports 37 the ongoing work.

38
39
40 'Ultimately it's all been down to relationships which we know is a key part of 41 the participation as protection model.' (Former YRAP academic supporting 42 staff)

43
44
45
46 Before joining YRAP, each new member is engaged one-to-one by a research team member, 47 supporting the development of a strong, trusting relationship and a basis for ongoing one-to-
48 one support and development. One YRAP member explains the importance of this as part of 49 a recent podcast:

50
51
52
53
54 'Personally, having someone come and talk to me, getting to know me,
55 building a connection, is crucial. Feeling safe is important to young people,
56 especially those who have not always experienced safety in their lives.

1
2
3 Making sure time and space is held to create these relationships should be a
4 high priority. A key part of ensuring these trusting relationships and a healthy
5 work environment is to prioritise time, rapport-building and relationship-
6 building. And this leads to a level of understanding and trust that helps us to 7 plan and anticipate for risks.” (Quote from YRAP / Research in Practice
8 podcast, 2023)
9
10
11
12
13
14
15

16 As a YRAP team we recognise a direct link between building relationships and the holding and 17 management of risk. For example, the foundation of trusting relationships facilitates more 18 open dialogue during research project work and supports us to hold space for new ideas and 19 to better manage conflict.
20
21
22

23 A reflective learning culture

24
25
26
27
28 A recurring theme throughout our work was the importance of a reflective learning culture
29 which valued transparency, avoided blame and managed risk. . As both YRAP members and 30 academic supporting staff we acknowledged that YRAP is a space in which it is okay to make 31 mistakes. We have been able to say ‘this is the first time we're doing this. We're figuring it
32 out’ and that we commit to learn as we go. For academic supporting staff this is noted to be 33 particularly significant – supporting confidence to hold risk and feel that ambitious aims are 34 manageable:
35
36
37
38
39
40
41

42 ‘One of the things that really stood out for me when I joined was that it didn't
43 have to be perfect. We learned as we went ... [normally] if you make a 44 mistake, it's kind of a failure. But that wasn't the case with this... and I think 45 that's really important to highlight as well, because I think if you know that 46 maybe that reduces the fear’ (Former YRAP academic supporting staff)
47
48
49
50
51

52 Challenges and shortcomings

53
54 Despite careful planning and the approaches that have served YRAP well, there are still 55 shortcomings and challenges. Some of these are acknowledged above – such as the 56 potential for distress or conflict. Below we highlight five additional structural challenges:
57 working within an institutional system (the University and beyond); short-term funding;
58
59
60

1
2
3 working across differences; issues of representation (or the limits to it); and balancing
4 reactive and proactive work.
5

6
7 These challenges are not unique to our participation work on sexual abuse. By sharing, we
8 hope to encourage cultures and conversations of transparency that don't render youth
9 participation easy, straightforward or unproblematic. We ourselves have been emboldened
10 by others' honest accounts of youth participation (Thomas and Larkins, 2019).
11
12
13

14 15 Working within a University system and wider institutional context

16
17 University institutions are often not designed or suited to collaborative work with 18 communities and knowledge rooted in non-academic expertise. Recent years have seen a
19 growth of co-production within UK universities, but institutional challenges remain
20 (Whittington, 2019). A key example is how to contract and pay collaborators whose profile
21 and contribution does not 'fit' the usual employee. YRAP members (aged 16 and above) are 22 on visiting staff contracts – a welcome, if long sought, solution providing pay, paid holiday
23 and pension contributions. However, contracts remain short term, without guaranteed hours, 24 and require complex bureaucratic processes. It's worth noting too that this would not be 25 possible at all other institutions. Meanwhile wider challenges befall individuals claiming 26 benefits who may lose out on benefit income by taking payment for participation (DWP, 27 2023). . This disproportionately impacts YRAP members leaving care, on disability benefits, or 28 with caring responsibilities and YRAP members have had to turn down collaboration on this 29 basis.
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40

41 42 Short-term funding

43
44 Meanwhile, inconsistent and short-term funding streams can create a culture of instability
45 that inhibit longer-term planning or ongoing recruitment for new YRAP members. Given the 46 relatively long-term cycles of engagement – with YRAP recruitment and induction spanning 47 months – the engagement of new members feels feasible only at the outset of funding.
48 Funding cycles also impact staff retention, making the relational working at the core of YRAP
49 challenging. We are working hard, with university support, to embed the work of YRAP as part
50 of our core University research structures, rightfully justified on the basis of enhancing the 51 so-called 'research environment', and there are promising commitments of funding from the 52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 university. Though slow moving, this feels like part of shifting an institutional research culture
4 to move participation from the margins to the centre.
5
6

7 Group work at distance

8
9 YRAP brings together young people and academics across the whole of the UK, with different
10 life experiences. Effective group work, which forms the basis of YRAP's work, necessitates 11 acknowledging and working with differences to develop trust and working alliances between 12 group members.
13
14
15

16
17 This involves facilitating time and space for young people to get to know each other, which 18 can be challenging given the geographic spread of members. Online spaces are useful but 19 have demonstrated limitations to building trust and familiarity – particularly in the early 20 stages of group formation. For example, as YRAP members we've found body language and 21 facial expressions harder to 'read' online and, as supporting staff, we experienced how 22 managing group dynamics requires different techniques to those we might use in person. The 23 inception of our second intake to YRAP at the onset of COVID demonstrated these challenges.
24
25
26

27
28 The ever-present passion which so many of us feel about topics under discussion can also 29 deepen the emotion associated with these differences.
30
31
32

33
34
35 'There were comments made, and ideas put out and suggestions and some 36 people were just clashing. It wasn't a great experience, but we did learn quite 37 a lot from that. And it just highlighted that yes, we're all different, we all have 38 different views, and we all have different opinions but bringing them all
39 together is what makes us unique.' (YRAP member) 40
41
42
43

44
45 As the comment above highlights, one strategy has been to support us to recognise these 46 differences as a strength of our work. This also means supporting us all to express views 47 respectfully both where they align and diverge.
48
49

50
51 'And that is what YRAP has taught me - to communicate in a professional 52 manner and be true to myself and just know that what I'm feeling is fine and 53 it's ok and if someone else doesn't feel it or agree with it - it's completely
54 fine.' (YRAP member)
55
56
57
58
59
60

Issues of representation and the limits of it

A recurring challenge for YRAP is widening participation to include representation from more diverse life experiences and identities. These shortcomings are hard to address within a small group. Ultimately our group size is determined by a need to ensure we have staff resources to provide supervision for all members. The group's composition is also determined by engagement routes through which recruitment takes place. Naturally these reflect wider systemic inequalities and the exclusion or under-representation of particular groups of young people in CSA services: disabled young people, young men and those from racially minoritised communities in particular (Warrington et al., 2017).

A related issue is the specialist focus of the group, foregrounding the 'single issue' of sexual abuse, despite the fact that all YRAP members have biographies or characteristics that have exposed us to varied forms of injustice. It can mean that in certain research projects there are moments of isolation and 'being the "only one" in the group with a [certain] marginalised identity [can feel] like a heavy responsibility in terms of representing' (Former YRAP member).

Questions of diversity and representation extend to the staff team, as a former YRAP member notes:

'During my time working with YRAP, one of the first observations I noticed was that the [academic supporting staff] lacked representation in terms of race, gender, and ethnicity.' (Former YRAP member)

All academic supporting staff working on YRAP to date identify as white women – reflecting dominant identities in both practice and research in this field. While not quick or easy to address, it is vital we continue to acknowledge and reflect on the implications of our identities when working together.

Balancing proactive and reactive work

Another challenge for us in YRAP has been making decisions about where to focus efforts. Many requests for YRAP involvement stem from external partners keen to meet criteria for inclusion of 'lived experience' in their research - and YRAP engagement can seem like an efficient means for doing this. This often results in work for us which is short term and can feel like a means of co-opting young people's perspectives to serve institutional agendas.

1
2
3 Decision-making among the group about what to engage with is complex. We find it echoes
4 reflections from Morrow (2001) that children's participation opportunities can be
5 participative and tokenistic at the same time; or simultaneously have aspects of young people
6 being co-opted into adult agendas and agenda setting (Kiili and Larkin, 2018). Last-minute
7 requests for YRAP's involvement can be hard to decline when it's a chance to influence
8 significant policy – but equally these opportunities have limits. They represent what Cornwall
9 (2004) defines as 'invited spaces' – where the agenda and terms of reference for influence
10 are already set. Crucially, we have found that they can also detract from work on our own
11 priorities and agenda. YRAP's most fulfilling, meaningful (and arguably influential) work has 12 been on projects led by us or which integrates our involvement from the outset.
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22

23 Participation as protection – reconsidering impact

24 Having focused at length on how we work we now turn to the question of 'why'? As noted
25 above, this is slow, relationship-based work involving challenges, emotions and conflict. Work
26 requires sustained and significant resources to support meaningful youth participation
27 addressing sexual abuse within research. This in turn means high levels of commitment are 28 required from all involved, including funders and host organisations.
29
30
31
32
33

34 For this reason - and particularly in contexts of resistance to children and young people's 35 engagement in sexual violence research and practice - it is essential that we can clearly explain
36 the value of participatory work to build wider engagement with such approaches. We 37 advocate for proper resourcing, and encouraging partners to engage with, rather than avoid 38 risks that are often felt to be significant barriers to youth participation. As one YRAP member 39 succinctly notes: 'we want people to value this work better'.
40
41
42
43
44
45

46 These ideas form the basis for our Participation as Protection infographic (see fig 1). The 47 infographic - developed collectively over several years with the support of artist Zuhura
48 Plummer - provides a 'conceptual and visual framework'. It explains how young people's 49 participation in the field of sexual violence supports young people's safety, individually and 50 collectively. It followed a period of our own research, reflecting and analysing evidence for 51 how participation had benefitted us and others around us. Though space precludes a 52 comprehensive outline of the model, our final section highlights and unpacks some key
53 relationships between participation and protection outlined in the model.
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Fig 1. Participation as protection infographic (more detailed view available at:

<https://www.beds.ac.uk/media/ijjk3bvc/participation-as-protective-poster-web-3000-72dpi.jpg>)

This model seeks to reframe risk and highlight the risks of omission or exclusion while making visible the manifold and hidden value of participation work in contexts of trauma and oppression. It responds to previous calls to create a 'more explicit articulation of the indivisibility of children's rights to participation, protection and provision' (Warrington and Larkin, 2019: 134). Though these arguments are not new (Hamilton et al., 2019; Mitchell et al., 2023; Lefevre et al., 2019) we think they bear repeating and better interrogating.

Elements of our model highlight different modes of participation – such as the value of peer support and group work. Here, we demonstrate multiple ways in which peers can strengthen safety and protection for one another – supporting access to opportunities and services; countering isolation, stigma or self-blame; and supporting young people to recognise their value and rights. Furthermore it highlights the ability of work with peers to support shifting perspectives from the personal to the political. As one YRAP member explains:

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

'A part of the model that stands out to me ...reads, 'Young people start to shift their perspectives from personal to systemic/political' [see fig 2: Personal to the political]. I actually noticed this change within myself when I joined YRAP in 2019. I did feel really isolated and my opinions were all tailored around my own experiences. Since then, my role within YRAP has not only broadened my perspectives but has also really built on my empathy and ability to imagine myself in other people's positions in order to speak on issues that we aim to change... it makes us see the bigger picture and be able to change that which needs changing.' (YRAP Member)

Fig 2. 'Personal to the political'

The quote above demonstrates the potential for young people's involvement in research to help develop critical thinking skills and consciousness (Freire, 1973), which in turn allow them to contribute to changing things to help protect others.

Other YRAP members highlight the significance of the relationship between research and social change, citing tangible examples of how their work in research had influenced policy or practice (see fig 3: Young people's influence creates service improvements). As YRAP members we also recognise that seeing our influence builds self-efficacy and confidence to implement wider changes in our own lives and the world around us.

Fig 3. 'Young people's influence creates service improvements'

Relatedly YRAP members reflect on how helping to design research had a personal impact on our wellbeing and protection - linked to the importance of enabling young people to assert influence and control in the aftermath of trauma.

'Participation has been so empowering and healing for me, to feel part of real change. When young people experience this kind of trauma, difficult decisions are made for them, and they feel like they don't really have any sense of control over their life or even their own bodies. Feeling in control and feeling like you can make an impact has been instrumental in my recovery. (YRAP member)

Conclusion

'YRAP isn't therapy, but it is therapeutic in that it has a much more of a rippled impact on a sense of worth... And although that's not the aim of YRAP, it is a by-product of it. And I think that's really important as well because that also links back to that protectiveness, doesn't it, because it gives you a sense of who you are and the opportunities that [we've] spoken about.' (Former YRAP academic supporting staff)

Developing this model has created time and space for us to reflect together on YRAP and its role within our research culture and wider practice and policy. It has supported us to further review our practice and develop our ideas more deeply, carefully and collaboratively, so that future cohorts of YRAP members can build on this.

1
2
3 Similarly, the process of writing this article has created a focussed space for us to reflect
4 openly about the challenges as well as achievements of our work with the hope we will
5 spark other people's conversation and practice. This reminds us of the benefits of processes
6 as well as outputs. Models and conceptual frameworks are helpful communication tools,
7 but also the journey of creating together holds value. The reflective culture we describe as
8 core to YRAP is one we have found can be fostered not just through talking but also writing,
9 visualising and making things together.

10
11
12 Unsurprisingly, in the process of writing this article we also identified gaps and new aspects 13 of our work we want to share with others. For example, our existing Participation as 14 Protection model focuses primarily on benefits to children and young people. Although they 15 are rightly centred, there are also benefits to organisations and adults who work alongside 16 young people that continue to remain obscured. A revelatory moment in our process of 17 developing this article came when we shared reflections about how being part of YRAP had 18 changed us. Several YRAP members expressed shock upon hearing about the impact of the 19 work on academic supporting staff. The idea that the impact of YRAP was bi (or multi)-
20 directional - with young researchers influencing, teaching and changing supporting research
21 staff - came as a surprise. We subsequently realised that the concept of reciprocity within 22 participatory research remains less considered, highlighting how pervasive inequalities
23 endure within our work. Perhaps these are the legacy of a 'welfare model' that prioritises
24 individual case work (and 'rescue' of individuals) over collective models of care. We believe 25 that further work is needed to explore this and further embed reciprocity and mutuality
26 within our work.

27
28
29 We conclude by noting that as long as resistance to child and youth participation in contexts
30 of trauma continues, we see a clear role for YRAP in advocating for such approaches in 31 research and practice while recognising enduring tensions. For example there remains the 32 challenge that YRAP (and groups like them) are often held up as exceptions. Furthermore 33 we recognise that the presence of YRAP potentially enables some professionals to exclude 34 other young people from research or influencing roles if collaboration with YRAP enables 35 them to avoid developing their own pathways for co-production or participation initiatives.
36 We want others to use YRAP to recognise what is possible – to learn from our mistakes and 37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60 better understand how young people’s participation in research and elsewhere is an essential aspect of upholding children’s rights and preventing harm to children everywhere.

For Peer Review

References

- 1
2
3
4
5 Abianda (2023) Elevate Young Women's Leadership and Skills Development Project see:
6 <https://www.abianda.com/participation-projects>
7
- 8 Archard, D. (2004) Children: Rights and childhood. 2nd Edition. London: Routledge 9
- 10 Atkinson, C., Coll, L., McBride, R.-S., Whittington, E., & Zanatta, F. (2022). Growing sideways:
11 Re-articulating ontologies of childhood within/through relationships and sexuality education
12 (RSE). Children & Society. <https://doi.org/10.1111/chso.12535>
13
- 14 AYPH/Association of Young People's Health (2013) Be Healthy Project Booklet. London.
15 AYPH/ University of Bedfordshire
16
- 17 Barnardos SECOS (2008) Word on the Street [Magazine] Middlesbrough: KENAZ.
18
- 19 Beresford and Carr S (Eds) (2012) Social Care, Service Users and User Involvement. London:
20 Jessica Kingsley
21
- 22 Brady, L.-M., & Graham, B. (2019). Social research with children and young people: a
23 practical guide Bristol. Policy Press.
24
- 25 Bovarnick, S., Peace, D, Warrington, C. and Pearce, J (2018). Being heard: promoting children 26 and young people's involvement in participatory research on sexual violence: findings from 27 an international scoping review. Luton: The International Centre: Researching child sexual 28 exploitation, violence and trafficking, University of Bedfordshire.
29
- 30 Bovarnick, S., & Cody, C. (2021). Putting risk into perspective: Lessons for children and youth
31 services from a participatory advocacy project with survivors of sexual violence in Albania,
32 Moldova and Serbia. Children and Youth Services Review, 126, 106003-
33 <https://doi.org/10.1016/j.childyouth.2021.106003>
34
- 35 Chambers, R (1994) Paradigm shifts and the practice of participatory research and 36 development Brighton. Institute of Development Studies
37
- 38 Cody, C., Bovarnick, S., Peace, D., & Warrington, C. (2022). 'Keeping the informal safe':
39 Strategies for developing peer support initiatives for young people who have experienced
40 sexual violence. Children & Society, 36(5), 1043–1063. <https://doi.org/10.1111/chso.12555>
41
- 42 Cornwall, A. (2004) 'Spaces for Transformation: Reflections on Issues of Power and 43 Difference in Participation in Development', in Hickey, S. and Mohan, G. (eds.) Participation:
44 From Tyranny to Transformation. Exploring New Approaches to Participation in 45 Development. London: Zed Books.
46
- 47 Cuevas-Parra, P. (2018). Exploring child-led research: case studies from Bangladesh, Lebanon
48 and Jordan. University of Edinburgh.
49
- 50 Department for Work and Pensions, (2023) Employment and Support Allowance: permitted
51 work, https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/employment-and-support-allowance-
52 permitted-work-form, Accessed Feb 2024
53
54
55
- 56 Feinstein, C. and O'Kane, C. (2008) Children and Adolescent's participation and protection
57 from sexual abuse and exploitation. Innocenti Working Paper. Florence. UNICEF Innocenti
58 Research Centre. Florence.
59
60

- 1
2
3 Freire, P. (1973) Education for Critical Consciousness. New York: The Continuum Publishing
4 Company.
5
- 6 Fox, M., & Fine, M. (2015). Leadership in Solidarity: Notions of Leadership through Critical
7 Participatory Action Research with Young People and Adults. New Directions for Student
8 Leadership, 2015(148), 45–58. <https://doi.org/10.1002/yd.20152>
9
- 10 James, A. and Prout, A. (1990) Constructing and Reconstructing Childhood: Contemporary 11 Issues in the Sociological Study of Childhood, Basingstoke: The Falmer Press.
12
- 13 Hamilton, C. J., Rodgers, A., Howard, K., & Warrington, C. (2019). From the ground up:
14 young research advisors' perspectives on relationships between participation and 15 protection. Journal of Children's Services, 14(3), 228–234. https://doi.org/10.1108/JCS-07-
16 2019-0037
17
- 18 Kiili, J. and Larkins, C. (2018) Invited to labour or participate: intra- and inter-generational 19 distinctions and the role of capital in children's invited participation in Discourse: Studies in 20 the Cultural Politics of Education, 39(3) 408-421
21 <http://dx.doi.org/10.1080/01596306.2016.1274290>
22
- 23 Lefevre, M., Hickie, K., & Luckock, B. (2019). 'Both/And' Not 'Either/Or': Reconciling Rights
24 to Protection and Participation in Working with Child Sexual Exploitation. The British Journal
25 of Social Work, 49(7), 1837–1855. <https://doi.org/10.1093/bjsw/bcy106>
26
- 27 Mitchell, M., Lundy, L., & Hill, L. (2023). Children's Human Rights to 'Participation' and 28 'Protection': Rethinking the relationship using Barnahus as a case example. Child Abuse
29 Review (Chichester, England: 1992), 32(6). <https://doi.org/10.1002/car.2820> 30
- 31 Morrow, V. (2001) 'Young people's explanations and experiences of social exclusions:
32 retrieving Bourdieu's concept of social capital', International Journal of Sociology and Social 33 Policy, vol. 21 (4), 37- 63.
34
- 35 Elphick, J and Notté, E (2023) Creating safe spaces to talk about the risk of child exploitation
36 [Blog] Available at: https://www.our-voices.org.uk/news/2023/creating-safe-spaces-to-talk-
37 about-the-risk-of-child-exploitation
38
- 39 Rabe, J (2023) Step Up, Speak Out: Co-producing knowledge with young people on 40 addressing sexual violence through collaborative participatory approaches. ECDV
41 Conference paper and poster in European Conference on Domestic Abuse. Reykjavik 11-13
42 September 2023
43
- 44 Taylor-Browne, J. (2002) More than one chance! Young people involved in prostitution speak
45 out, London: ECPAT.
46
- 47 Templeton, M., Cuevas-Parra, P., & Lundy, L. (2023). Children's participation in international 48 fora: The experiences and perspectives of children and adults. Children & Society, 37(3), 49 786–805. <https://doi.org/10.1111/chso.12629>
50
- 51 Thomas, D., & Larkins, C. (2019). Next steps in children and young people's research, 52 participation and protection from the perspective of young researchers. Journal of 53 Children's Services, 14(3), 186–193. <https://doi.org/10.1108/JCS-07-2019-0038>
54
- 55 United Nations (1989) United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC),
56 Geneva: United Nations.
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Warrington, C., with Beckett, H., Ackerley, E., Walker, M., and Allnock, D. (2017) Making
4 Noise: children's voices for positive change after sexual abuse. Luton: University of 5 Bedfordshire/ Office of Children's Commissioner. [Available at:
6 <https://www.beds.ac.uk/media/86813/makingnoise-20042017.pdf>]

7
8 Warrington, C., & Larkins, C. (2019). Children at the centre of safety: challenging the false
9 juxtaposition of protection and participation. Journal of Children's Services, 14(3), 133–142.
10 <https://doi.org/10.1108/JCS-09-2019-055>

11
12 Wright, L. H. V., Tisdall, E. K. M., Collins, T., Jamieson, L., Rizzini, I., Mayhew, A., Narang, J., &
13 Ruiz-Casares, M. (2020). Involving child and youth advisors in academic research about child
14 participation: The child and youth advisory committees of the international and Canadian 15 Child Rights Partnership.

16
17 Whittington, E. (2019), "Co-producing and navigating consent in participatory research with 18 young people", Journal of Children's Services, Vol. 14 No. 3, pp. 205-216.
19 <https://doi.org/10.1108/JCS-02-2019-0007>

20
21 Yamaguchi, S., Tuong, J., Tisdall, E. K. M., Bentayeb, N., Holtom, A., Iyer, S. N., & Ruiz-
22 Casares, M. (2023). "Youth as accessories": Stakeholder Perspectives on Youth Participation
23 in Mental Health Policymaking [Part II]. Administration and Policy in Mental Health and
24 Mental Health Services Research, 50(1), 84–99. https://doi.org/10.1007/s10488-022-01230-
25 1

26
27 YRAP/ Research in Practice (2023) Participation as protection podcast. Published
28 18/05/2023. Available at: https://www.researchinpractice.org.uk/children/content-
29 pages/podcasts/participation-as-protection/